THE POST OF THE WEEK

When a company is feeling the pinch for internal reasons, it can do one of two things. Sort matters out itself or call in expert advice from outside. The former, however, is like a man trying to examine his own heart. He is too close to it, it is uncomfortable and well-nigh impossible. Far better to let a doctor do it. The Institute and the Finance Bill

THE publication of the 226-page Finance Bill on April 27th left the public reeling under the blows showered upon them and much of the subsequent criticism has tended to be incoherent, because so much of the Bill seemed incomprehensible. However, its provisions have been undergoing close scrutiny by keen minds. Clause 12, with its many possible repercussions, was under attack from The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales more than two weeks ago, and almost immediately the Government were promising to look into it again, with special reference to partners' pensions and separation agreements. This week the Institute returned to the attack with a memorandum of fourteen closely-packed pages (reproduced in this issue) covering a host of carefully reasoned criticisms which are going to set the Government thinking very hard about the amendments to be brought forward at the Report stage.

The memorandum begins in an encouraging way by welcoming the two White Papers which accompanied the Bill, and by expressing the hope for more official clarification when the Bill reaches the Statute Book. The remaining eighty-three paragraphs are almost entirely critical in tone, and are all the more devastating by their obvious reasonableness. For instance, the CHANCELLOR justified the termination of special reliefs for national insurance contributions on the ground that an increase in personal allowance would do the same thing (except admittedly for surtax payers). The Institute points out that another result is to deprive taxpayers of the relief for contributions for domestic servants, and non-trading associations of the relief for employees.

The Council of the Institute expresses no view about the desirability or otherwise of expenditure on business entertaining but it does regret that, in a measure designed to tax business profits (and we would underline 'profits'), there should be a departure from principle in the form of an arbitrary disallowance of an entire category of business expenses; irrespective of its benefit to the trading income. The Council expresses a preference for retaining the 'wholly and exclusively' test. This is particularly important for sole traders and partnerships, where the disallowed expense, which ex hypothesi is spent, may be taxed to income tax and surtax at the top rate. In the case of a company paying only corporation tax the disallowance is not so grave. The Council goes on to criticize specific provisions of clause 14, in particular the definition of an overseas customer. One detects a note of irony in the point that the taxpayer is not likely to know whether his guest is 'ordinarily resident' in the United Kingdom or not, this being a highly technical matter.

On the question of capital gains tax, the Institute's memorandum has a number of very pertinent points to make. It also puts its finger on a drafting error. Clause 41 (1) defines 'control' by reference to section 256 of the Income Tax Act, 1952. However, as the memorandum says, this section is being repealed by Schedule 19. The Government have apparently discovered their error because they have tabled an amendment which removed from clause 41 (1) the reference to section 256. Instead, the sub-clause refers the reader to paragraph 3 of Schedule 17, which contains its own definition of 'control' and is expressed to be 'for the purposes of this schedule'. Another object of the Institute's criticism is clause 40 (8) which provides that disputes about the value of unquoted shares shall be decided by the General and not the Special Commissioners.

Capital gains tax takes up to the end of page 5 of the memorandum. The remaining nine pages are devoted, if we may use the term, to the new system of taxing companies. By way of introduction, the Council urges again that the existing profits tax provisions for intra-group aggregation of profits and losses should be carried into the corporation tax legislation. The subvention provisions are inadequate. Moreover, some form of abatement should be available to the small company, bearing in mind the heavy taxation on distributions. Perhaps one of the most bewildering aspects of Part IV of the Bill is the way in which the subject of charges is dealt with in different clauses, one apparently allowing them and one apparently disallowing them. As the memorandum says, the provisions about charges should be dealt with in one place. This is bound up with the Government's decision to carry into the new corporation tax not only the capital gains tax but also all the varied methods of computing income for income tax purposes, depending on the kind of source.

Clause 44 (3) confers an option on groups and consortia under which they can elect that internal dividends be paid without deduction of tax. But dividends are only one species of a large genus of distributions which are extensively defined in Schedule 10. This schedule is also the subject of detailed criticism. The memorandum suggests that the option should extend to all distributions, and that it should not be restricted to those paying companies which carry on a trade.

Drastic alteration is called for, in the Institute's view, to clause 78 of the Bill. This clause is intended to forestall avoidance of the new system of requiring companies to deduct tax at standard rate from dividends and hand it over to the Revenue. The new system comes into operation in 1966–67 and the Government evidently fear a widespread stepping up of dividends in 1965–66 with a corresponding fall after that year. Clause 78 provides that the excess in 1965–66 over the 'standard amount' is deemed to have been paid in 1966–67, with consequent liability to hand over the tax to the Revenue. Broadly speaking, the standard amount is 5 per cent of the share capital, or the average of the three preceding years' dividends actually paid, with a limit to the company's actual profit. The rate of only 5 per cent recalls the Daltonian days of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent Government stocks, rather than a period when the Bank rate seems to be frozen at 7 per cent. As the Council say, with studied moderation, 5 per cent is unrealistic. The Council also asks for a grouping arrangement for groups, for the disregard of arrears of preference dividends paid in 1965–66, and for taking into account surtax directions and apportionments for the purpose of arriving at the standard dividend. It suggests that every company should have the option of taking one-half of the 1965–66 profits as the standard amount. It reinforces the argument by giving concrete instances which we should think assuredly the draftsmen of the Bill have not thought of. Suppose, for instance, that the directors of a public company had already announced before Budget day the payment of increased dividends in 1965–66; or that shares with a modest dividend record had been put on the market on the basis of a prospectus promising a large dividend in 1965–66 and subsequent years.

Naturally the memorandum does not seek in any way to enter the political arena. Nevertheless, given the decision to make the broad changes contemplated in the Budget, it is highly important that the legislation which effects this should be well thought out and not unduly restrictive of enterprise.

CAPITAL GAINS TAX

Surviving the Committee Stage

THE capital gains tax contained in Part III of the Finance Bill has just survived a long and gruelling committee stage in the House of Commons during which all-night sittings were common, and narrow escapes on the part of the Government equally so. During this stage of the Bill the Government took the opportunity to correct some of the more obvious drafting errors.

Efforts by the Opposition to have an exemption limit were unavailing. The Government prefers to rely on clause 20 which confers on the taxpayer the option of treating two-thirds of his capital gain as income assessable under Case VI of Schedule D (and to surtax), the other third being then allowed to go untaxed. An attempt to reduce this fraction to one-half was equally unavailing. However, the FINANCIAL SECRETARY admitted that the two-thirds concession did not give much to the small taxpayer who was paying at the standard rate of tax; it merely reduced the rate from 30 per cent to 27½ per cent. On the other hand, to make the fraction one-half would bring benefits to surtax payers, so that very few people would not be exercising the option. For a married man with two children, and an income of £5,000 and investments worth £2,000, there can be a gain of £600 on the two-thirds option. If it were changed to one-half he could gain a maximum of £8,637. The FINANCIAL SECRETARY promised to introduce an amendment at the Report stage; possibly substituting three-fifths for two-thirds.

The Government resisted an amendment to exclude tangible moveable property from charge, although the official arguments for keeping it in were not very impressive. In the words of the FINANCIAL SECRETARY 'It is not possible to form any view of the yield of this tax on chattels, and no attempt has been made to do so'. He did not seek to justify the tax on the basis of yield; it is apparently a matter of appeasement to those voters who do not acquire and dispose of chattels at a profit. The evidence of the report of the Royal Commission establishes that a large army of valuers will be needed in order to make the tax work. Bearing in mind that the taxpayer can set off losses on chattels against gains on investments, it could well be that this army would be paid for no advantage to the country at all. The exemption for chattels realizing no more than £1,000, not being part of a 'set' brings in more anomalies. A man who sells a herd of, say, 200 animals, each worth less than £1,000, will pay nothing on his gains.

A member wished to know whether a racehorse owner who spent money on training and racing it, thus enhancing its value, would be allowed to deduct the expenses in arriving at his capital gains. The answer was the Government just did not know. The FINANCIAL SECRETARY, a lawyer, said 'I should not like to predict the answer when the matter is tested'. In the meantime, what is the racehorse owner to do? Surely if the Government do not know, they should alter the wording to make it clear one way or the other.

An Opposition amendment to delete clause 21 (3) was defeated but not until the MINISTER WITHOUT PORTFOLIO had promised to reconsider the subclasue on the Report. Clause 21(3) brings in capital sums 'derived from assets notwithstanding that no asset is acquired by the person paying the capital sum'. This includes sums received by way of compensation for any kind of damage or injury to assets. The MINISTER WITHOUT PORTFOLIO, possibly speaking from a brief prepared for him, began confidently enough to justify the subclause. However, when members on the other side pointed out some of the implications he became less confident. These implications had obviously not occurred to the Government or their advisors. If an asset is destroyed and insurance money is received, which, but for capital gains tax, would have been expended in precise replacement, the owner may be prevented by the tax from making the replacement. This could be very serious for him. If, on the other hand, the insurance company itself replaces the asset (perhaps at greater cost) there will be no capital sum and therefore no question of capital gains tax. The subclause really makes no sense. If the asset is very badly damaged but not destroyed, and the owner applies the insurance money in repair and restoration, again he will pay no tax. Another useful result of the debate was the admission by the MINISTER that if a man loses an asset, even by negligence, that is a disposal at a loss and he will be able to set off the loss against other gains.

The Government took the opportunity of correcting a careless error in drafting in clause 21 (4), and also of recasting clause 21 (8) in a more intelligible form. They also accepted an Opposition amendment to add further words to clause 21 (8) to make it even more clear. The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants was mentioned by SIR JOHN FOSTER, Q.C., in relation to clause 21 (4) (a) which provides inter alia that > 'a person's acquisition of an asset and the disposal of it by him . . . shall be deemed to be for a consideration equal to the market value . . .'

> 'in particular where he acquires it by way of . . . distribution from a company in respect of shares in the company'.

Sir JOHN said the Association feared that these words would mean that bonus issues of fully-paid shares would be subjected to capital gains tax before they were realized. The FINANCIAL SECRETARY confirmed that the bonus issue would not be subject to tax before it was disposed of. The answer was in paragraph 4 (2) of Schedule 7.

The drafting of clause 22 (losses) was improved and the FINANCIAL SECRETARY promised that when clause 21 (3) was considered he would also look at clause 22 (6). This provides that where compensation is paid for damage and any loss would otherwise accrue the case is not to be treated as a disposal. He also promised to look into the question of whether an asset lost by burglary or theft could be said to be dissipated or extinguished within the meaning of clause 22 (3).

Clause 23 imposes duty on the death of an owner. After the, by now ritual, passing of amendments to correct drafting errors, an Opposition member pointed out that where personal representatives sold an asset at a loss in order to realize funds, and there was no gain by them against which to set the loss, the loss would go unrelieved. The FINANCIAL SECRETARY undertook to bring in an amendment at the Report stage to deal with this, by allowing the loss to be carried back to previous years. He also announced another concession. The clause provides an exemption up to £5,000 in respect of the notional gains arising from death. This is for the free estate. It may be that the deceased is a life-tenant of a trust estate which also incurs liability on his death. Under the proposed amendment, any unused portion of the £5,000 exemption on the free estate will be set off against the notional gains accruing to the trustees of the settlement. The Government rejected the invitation of a Labour member to drop the idea of imposing capital gains tax on death. However they did undertake to look at the case of a man who built up the value of his own business by ploughing back taxed profits.

On clause 24, which provides for the imposition of tax on the trustees of settlements, the Government denied the suggestion that the advancement of a capital sum to a beneficiary could attract tax on the trust. It was also announced that the period of ten years laid down for the periodical imposition of duty on discretionary trusts would be extended to fifteen years. After the usual crop of drafting amendments to correct flaws in the original Bill, clauses 24 and 25 were adopted.

Clause 26 deals with miscellaneous exemptions which the Opposition unsuccessfully tried to extend. However, one proposed Opposition amendment was to exclude the exemption in favour of gambling winnings. It was argued that a betting ticket was an asset which might turn out to be valuable. To this the SOLICITOR-GENERAL said:

> 'I am not saying the ticket has no value. I am saying that it is not an asset in the sense in which we are concerned when considering capital gains tax.'

He also said that to tax gambling winnings and not to allow losses 'would be a rather novel principle to introduce in our tax law'. It is not as novel as all that. Indeed clause 19 (7) provides for that very thing in the case of the remittance basis. Clause 22 (7) disallows a loss incurred by a person who at the time is neither resident nor ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom. Has the SOLICITOR-GENERAL heard of loss relief under Case III where the debtor defaults?

Another surprising statement by the SOLICITOR-GENERAL was:

> 'When a company is in liquidation, any vesting of its assets in the hands of the liquidator, or any disposal of its assets by the liquidator, will similarly attract liability . . .'

The word 'similarly' refers to the vesting of the assets of a bankrupt in his trustee. But it is well known that when a company goes into liquidation its assets do not vest in the liquidator; he is merely the company's agent to dispose of them. The company still owns them.

Insurance for Practitioners

THE constant fear of every accountant in practice is that he may one day make a mistake which will involve him in a costly claim for professional negligence. There are three things he can do to help to allay this apprehension. He must on his own account exercise 'eternal vigilance'. This requires time, much thought, a considerable degree of concentration and a highly organized personal routine. The second precaution is to employ and train staff of the best calibre he can afford. The third is to have adequate insurance cover.

In a series of booklets on different aspects of practice administration, currently being issued at approximately monthly intervals, the Council of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales intends to cover all three points and, indeed, has already partly dealt with the first in its publication, The Development of an Accounting Practice, which appeared in April. A booklet on staff matters will appear later and this week sees the publication of Professional Practice Insurance[1], which reviews the main types of insurance practitioners should consider.

Its author, Mr G. R. APPLEYARD, F.C.A., divides his survey into four main headings – liability insurances, professional office policies, practitioner and employee benefit insurance and travel accidents which collectively embrace 'the needs of a typical firm of chartered accountants'. Under the first he discusses the risk of professional negligence in all its frightening forms at some length and, in his conclusions, rightly describes protection for the practitioner as a 'must'. He does not attempt to quantify the amount of cover required but advises his readers to employ the services of an insurance broker. He does suggest, however, that an adequate comprehensive insurance programme need not cost more than a half of 1 per cent of gross fees.

In addition to the excellence of his text, value is added to Mr APPLEYARD's booklet in the shape of four appendices one of which is a reprint of Lloyd's professional indemnity policy conditions for accountants.

Mathematical Programming in Accounting - a Comment

by L. R. AMEY, B.Ec., B.A., Ph.D.
Professor of Accounting, University of Bristol

IN his article in the issue of this journal of February 27th last, Mr J. M. Samuels performed a useful service in drawing the attention of your readers to the relevance of mathematical programming techniques in solving a number of accounting problems. The main part of his paper was concerned with short-run problems of optimization subject to constraints – of the kind to which cost accountants apply their 'limiting factor' formula. The need to turn to programming methods is, of course, equally great in long-run problems of constrained optimization such as are met in capital budgeting.

The other accounting applications of programming to which Mr Samuels referred – the use of the 'shadow' (or accounting) prices obtained from the 'dual' programming problem in setting transfer prices for the internal transactions of a decentralized or integrated firm, or to provide a rational method of allocating overheads (which I discuss later) are, like the first one, probably little known to many professional accountants.

My concern now is with the first of Mr Samuels's targets, the 'limiting factor' rule. I would like to add to what he has written two basic criticisms of my own, which he no doubt recognizes but does not state explicitly[1]. In not following up the implications of the first of these, Mr Samuels lets the cost accountants off more lightly than I should do. My second basic criticism is clearly recognized by Mr Samuels in his second example but is not linked up with the cost accountants' rule. My third comment concerns the programming approach only, and Mr Samuels's interpretation of the 'shadow prices'.

Identification of the 'Limiting Factor'

In my view the fundamental weakness of the accounting procedure (the 'limiting factor' formula) is a logical one. It springs from failure to draw the distinction between factors which are available only in limited quantities (these I should call fixed factors, or just constraints or restrictions), and that sub-set of these which are actually used to the limit in the process of maximizing the 'contribution' (the term 'limiting factor' ought properly to be reserved for these; they could also be referred to as binding constraints).

The accounting formula puts the cart before the horse in assuming that the limiting factor, as I have defined it, is known a priori. The identity of the factor or factors which will effectively limit production is in general only revealed after the production plan which maximizes the objective function (here 'contribution') has been determined. One standard textbook on programming[1] puts it this way:

> 'The problem (of maximizing profits) would be much simplified if only we knew in advance which limitation would actually be binding. . . . In actual practice . . . we have to solve problems in initial ignorance of which restrictions (fixed factors) are really going to be binding and which we can ignore safely.'

In other words the programming formulation differs from the accounting rule in explicitly stating all constraints, irrespective of whether they are expected to be binding. Given the complexity of most production situations, and in particular the number of factors whose supply is fixed for certain intervals of time which vary from one factor to another, I doubt whether there are many situations in which the limiting factor or factors can be correctly guessed by the accountant without going through the process of optimization (i.e., in the case we are considering, finding which product or combination of products to produce, and in what quantities, in order to yield the greatest 'contribution').

In fact, on grounds of wrong identification alone, it can be stated that the 'limiting factor' rule will only lead to a correct (i.e. optimal) solution (i) by chance, or (ii) in cases where there is only one fixed factor which is also used to the limit in maximizing 'contribution', or (iii) if the limiting factor happens to be chosen correctly on an a priori basis.

Mr Samuels's remark (page 265 of his article), to the effect that if there is only one limiting factor the problem is trivial and may be solved by using the accounting formula, is only correct if 'limiting factor' means a binding constraint; (it is not correct in the sense in which the cost accountants use it). It should be apparent from the foregoing that the chances of this happening on an a priori basis are fairly remote. (For example, a realistic case could be presented in which there are three products, two fixed factors but only one limiting factor (and therefore only one product produced); and this would not be at all evident from an inspection of the data.) I would prefer to say that the 'limiting factor' rule is wrongly conceived and will in general lead to wrong solutions[2].

Successive 'Limiting Factors'

According to the statement by The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants –

> 'the value of the technique of using the contribution per unit of the limiting factor as the indicator of profitability is diminished . . . where economic conditions are changing rapidly and the limiting factor may quickly change.'[3]

Taking this to mean that there may be a switch in limiting factors over time, about all that can usefully be added on this point is that, assuming we are still dealing with an essentially short-period problem with given decision data and objective function (the only data that change are the physical limits on factors and not relative factor prices), then each change in limiting factor or factors will lead to a different optimal production plan unless the total quantities of successive limiting factors required by the various products (or processes) being considered are correlated.

Even if we suppose that the limiting factors can be correctly identified a priori, the costing formula may still give misleading answers if indivisibilities are present, in factors or in products. By this I mean that there may be 'lumpiness':

(i) in factor intakes (a factor, say a machine, may be available only in units, the smallest of which is large relative to a unit change in output); or

[1] Linear Programming and Economic Analysis, by Dorfman, Samuelson and Solow (McGraw-Hill, 1958), pages 16 and 27.

[2] I assume throughout that the particular course selected as optimal by the decision rule, whether this is stated in programming terms or in terms of the costing formula, is more profitable than any of the alternatives not considered.

[3] A Report on Marginal Costing, The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants, 1961, page 34.

(ii) in factor utilization (e.g. you may, for various reasons, have to work in complete shifts or complete machine-hours); or

(iii) in products (as when an entire batch must be produced or none at all).

That the costing formula may break down in these circumstances is intuitively obvious; in general, a different optimal production plan will result when factors/products are imperfectly divisible than when they are continuously divisible. The programming formulation, with a little modification, handles this complication. Instead of dealing with products (or processes) individually as the costing rule does, calculating 'contribution' per unit of 'limiting factor' for each product (process) in turn, it scans all possible combinations of products (processes) to select the set which maximizes the objective function subject to the given constraints.

If some of the fixed inputs are imperfectly divisible, and outputs of the products (processes) in which they are used can therefore not be adjusted continuously, an additional constraint is imposed on the problem. This makes computation more difficult, but several numerical techniques are available for dealing with this. By an appropriate choice of units it is possible to make the variables corresponding to the x's and y's in Mr Samuels' examples take on integer values only, up to the limits imposed by the constraints. Out of this we can obtain a valuable piece of information. In this modified problem the 'dual' variables related to the additional (integer) constraints on the primal programming problem provide a measure of the opportunity cost of indivisibility. We can, in other words, measure the cost, in terms of 'contribution' sacrificed, of employing factors whose use cannot be varied by small amounts.

'Shadow Prices'

My third comment[1] concerns Mr Samuels's interpretation of the 'shadow prices' of grades A and B labour (respectively $N=33{\cdot}6s$, $M=53{\cdot}2s$ per hour) in his first example. Since the market prices ($5s$ and $10s$ per hour, respectively) have already been netted out in arriving at unit 'contribution' ($P_1=140s$, $P_2=255s$) the correct conclusion to be drawn is that it would pay the firm to hire more labour, assuming it were possible to do this, provided that $N, M>0$.

[1] Credit is due to my colleague, Mr Gordon Mills, for spotting this point.

Allocation

The question of overhead allocation has been the subject of protracted and often tortuous discussion. There have been various attempts at rationalizing what in practice often appears as a highly arbitrary procedure – to see whether this procedure may not be capable of interpretation in a way which is economically rational (e.g. whether unit oncost thus determined might be taken to represent the business man's rough estimate of the opportunity cost of the resources involved).

When talking about overheads it is as well to begin by separating out the various strands of the argument; the treatment of overheads in questions concerning cost control and in decision-making (past and future overheads, respectively); whether to allocate and how to allocate. The question of whether to allocate is not as simple as the advocates of 'marginal' costing would make out; it requires us to go back to first principles in each case (and to ask questions about the nature of costs and their expected variability as a result of taking this decision).

The main value of 'marginal' costing is clearly considered to be as an aid to (short-period) decision-making; the I.C.W.A. report previously mentioned admits (paragraph 634) that not to allocate overheads may be to weaken cost control. In 'pre-programming' days one of the arguments frequently heard[2] against a complete acceptance of the 'marginal' costing technique was that it offered management little guidance in assessing the relative profitability of alternative jobs which would make unequal demands on some bottleneck factor – precisely the problem which we have been discussing. It has been shown that programming provides, first, a means of identifying the true bottlenecks (limiting factors) and secondly, a neat way of deciding, simultaneously, when and how to allocate overheads and net profit as well among jobs or processes, which is consistent with optimizing the firm's objective function ('contribution'). This it does via the 'shadow prices' of the fixed factors which, as Mr Samuels has explained, measure the value of their marginal products (or their maximum 'economic rents'); factors which are optimally not used to the limit have zero prices imputed to them, indicating that for purposes of resource allocation they are to be treated as costless and that their use should attract no oncost.

Legal Tender

by R. ROBERT, A.C.I.S.

SOMETHING in the nature of a mild sensation was created earlier in the year when the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Mr Niall MacDermot, told the House of Commons that bank notes issued in Scotland are not legal tender elsewhere in the United Kingdom. The matter was widely commented upon and a London newspaper actually sent out a reporter with a wad of Scottish banknotes to see whether any difficulty was experienced in getting them accepted. Needless to say, there was no difficulty – for tradespeople, booking clerks, and hoteliers regarded them as perfectly valid. Each note bears a promise to 'pay in sterling' and is readily exchangeable at any bank.

Nevertheless, the Parliamentary reply raised an interesting question: What exactly is 'legal tender'? According to the Oxford Dictionary it is 'money or other things that may be legally tendered or offered in payment' or 'currency prescribed by law as that in which payment may be made'. A more precise definition is given in The Coinage Act, 1870, section 4, which states that a tender of payment of money, if made in coins issued by the Mint in accordance with the provisions of the Act, and neither called in by proclamation nor diminished in weight by wear or otherwise, shall be legal tender (a) in the case of gold coins to any amount, (b) in the case of silver coins for payments not exceeding 40*s*, and (c) in the case of bronze coins for payments not exceeding 1*s*.

Cupro-nickel . . .

Bronze, though almost valueless, continues to weigh down our pockets; but those pockets have long since been empty of gold. Silver, too, has vanished – its withdrawal from circulation having been enforced by post-war difficulties. Its place has been taken by cupro-nickel which, as provided by The Coinage Act, 1946, is legal tender up to 40*s*. The awkward brass-nickel 3*d* pieces are also legal tender though, mercifully, not more than eight at a time need be accepted.

Apart from the question of convenience, these limitations now appear a little anachronistic. Those of 1870 made sense, for without some such restrictions Gresham's Law would have operated with a vengeance. The silver and bronze coins, whose face and intrinsic values by no means coincided, would have driven the 'good money' – i.e., the gold sovereigns and half-sovereigns – out of circulation. Such considerations do not apply today for the simple reason that gold coins must, under The Exchange Control Act, 1947, be offered for sale to an authorized dealer, unless the Treasury otherwise agrees.

Legal tender, to be valid, must be unconditional; it must cover the whole, and not just part of, the debt (with certain qualifications); and it must consist of current coin of the realm. A valid tender, surprisingly, does not necessarily extinguish a debt, though it does place the creditor in a false position should he decide to proceed with litigation. Two other points worth noting are that the act of tendering payment stops further accrual of interest on a debt, and extinguishes any right of lien the creditor may have had.

. . . and Cowrie Shells

Early in history many things other than metals have served as legal tender – in Africa and Southern Asia, cowrie shells; in ancient Rome, cattle and land; in China, bricks of tea. All have now been superseded by paper notes. Bank of England notes, for example, of the value of £1 and 10*s*, are legal tender in England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland, but the £5 notes in England and Wales only. So we have the amusing situation in which Scottish notes are not legal tender south of the border, while at least English £5 notes are not legal tender north of the border. Bills of exchange and cheques, it need hardly be added, are not legal tender.

The relevant statutes on the subject of banknotes are, of course, The Currency and Bank Notes Acts of 1928 and 1954, which should be consulted by anyone wishing to pursue the matter further.

In the U.S.A. a long struggle had to be waged before the famous dollar 'greenbacks' were firmly established as legal tender. They were first issued by Congress in 1862, with the object of financing Civil War operations. Inconvertible into gold, they quickly depreciated in value and their validity was challenged. Not until 1871 was the Supreme Court able to decide that the Acts of 1862–63 were constitutional and that the Treasury notes were legal tender.

Emergent Africa provides a more recent example of lack of confidence in State-backed currency. In March last, Rhodesia, Zambia, and Malawi were urgently calling in the currency of the former Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland because new currencies were to be issued. Three-quarters of the operation had been completed, but the authorities were worried about a sum of £6 million representing the final quarter. This was, presumably, being retained by Africans who were either unaware of, or antagonistic to, the change. They hoarded the old currency with stubborn tenacity despite the official warnings that, after June 1st, it would cease to be 'legal tender'. What that abstruse term meant, they probably neither knew nor cared!

The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales

Finance (No. 2) Bill, 1965

A Memorandum to the Chancellor of the Exchequer

The Council of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales has submitted to the Chancellor of the Exchequer the following comments which arise on preliminary consideration of the provisions of the Finance (No. 2) Bill now before Parliament.

INTRODUCTORY

1. The White Papers on corporation tax and capital gains tax are most helpful. The Council hopes that in addition explanatory notes on the new legislation will be published as soon as possible after enactment.

PART II – INCOME TAX

Clause 10 – Alterations in reliefs

2. The effect of clause 10 (4) and the repeal of section 377 (2) of the Income Tax Act, 1952 (and other repeals) in Schedule 19 is:

(a) to withdraw for income tax as well as for surtax purposes the national insurance relief previously allowed to individuals in respect of domestic employees; and

(b) to withdraw the national insurance relief previously allowed against taxed investment income to various non-trading bodies in respect of employees.

Whilst in his Budget speech the Chancellor observed that in consequence of this proposal surtax payers will pay more surtax, the withdrawal of income tax relief referred to in (a) and (b) above appears to go beyond the Chancellor's expressed intention of simplifying the existing system.

Clause 12 – Surtax on income under certain circumstances

3. The Council has made separate representations expressing its anxiety about the effects of clause 12 on partnership retirement arrangements on seeking reassurance or, if necessary, suitable amendment.

Clause 14 – Business entertaining expenses

4. While expressing no view on the desirability or otherwise of expenditure on business entertaining, the Council regrets that in a measure designed to tax business profits there should be a departure from principle in the form of an arbitrary disallowance of an entire category of business expense irrespective of its benefit to the trading income. Profits arise only to the extent that trading income exceeds trading expenses, and the Council therefore adheres to the view that it should be permissible to deduct all expenses which are wholly and exclusively incurred for the purposes of the business.

5. Attention is drawn to the fact that the disallowance of business entertaining expenses will impinge more heavily on sole traders and persons in partnership who are liable to income tax and surtax than it will on companies which are liable only to corporation tax.

6. The Council seeks assurance that it is not the intention to disallow expenditure in respect of staff activities, such as sports days.

7. As regards the detailed provisions of clause 14, the Council submits:

(a) that the reference to staff in line thirty-three of sub-clause 14 (5) should be extended to include wives of staff, and former staff and their wives;

(b) that the words 'not ordinarily resident' in the first lines of sub-clause 14 (6) (a) and (b) should be changed to 'not normally resident', since United Kingdom traders are unlikely to be in a position to ascertain the residence status of overseas customers as construed for income tax purposes;

(c) that, in relation to sub-clause 14 (6) and activities which have been found to play an important part in the promotion of export trade, consideration should be given to the treatment of expenses incurred in entertaining foreign trade delegations, parties of students sponsored by foreign Governments, officials of the embassies of foreign countries in whose territories the taxpayer has customers, and people attending international trade exhibitions held in this country. It is not clear to what extent expenses of this kind would be allowed or disallowed.

Clause 16 – Amendments of Case VII of Schedule D

8. Sub-clause 16 (4) makes currency other than sterling a chargeable asset with certain limited exceptions. The Council submits that where foreign currency has been specifically acquired by a trading concern for the purchase of goods or assets for use in its business the application of the foreign currency for that purpose should not rank as a disposal for Case VII purposes; the cost of the asset should be taken to be the cost of the currency so used.

Clause 17 – Amendments of Case VII of Schedule D: chattels sold for £1,000 or less

9. There appears to be no definition of the phrase 'terminal market' used in sub-clause 17 (5) (a). The Council submits that the meaning should be made clear.

PART III – CAPITAL GAINS TAX

Capital Gains Tax generally

10. The Chancellor will have considered most carefully the ability of the Inland Revenue and of taxpayers and their advisers to cope with the administrative burden of implementing the far-reaching measures which the present Finance Bill embraces. Nevertheless, the Council is anxious about this aspect, particularly in regard to the capital gains tax. The administrative implications of this tax will be far more severe than those associated with the introduction of the tax on short-term gains in 1962, notably because of the need to establish the cost or value of assets for the purpose of computing chargeable gains, which will in many cases be a difficult and time-consuming task.

Clause 19 – Capital Gains Tax

11. The proviso to Clause 19 (5) enables a husband or wife to elect for separate deduction of losses against the chargeable gains of the spouse incurring such losses provided application is made before July 6th in the year following the year of assessment. The Council submits that the period of three months allowed for such election is too short and should be extended to at least six months.

12. The Council also considers that the period of three months allowed between the end of the year of assessment and the due date for payment of capital gains tax as provided in clause 19 (6) will often be too short. It is submitted that in the case of tax payable on chargeable gains arising from deemed disposals and re-acquisitions (where there has been no realization and valuation will be necessary) a longer period should be allowed for payment as appropriate to the category of asset concerned. In any case the tax should not become due for payment earlier than a date thirty days after the assessment has become final.

Schedule 6 – Capital Gains: Computation

13. It is submitted that the definition of 'incidental costs' in sub-paragraph 4 (2) of Schedule 6 should include not only the kinds of expense specifically mentioned but all incidental expenses incurred wholly and exclusively for the purpose of acquiring or disposing of a chargeable asset and of determining the amount of gain or loss arising therefrom.

14. In sub-paragraph 4 (1) (b) there is reference to 'expenditure wholly and exclusively incurred on the asset . . . for the purpose of enhancing the value of the asset . . .'. The value of an asset may be enhanced by expenditure which is not necessarily on the asset itself, though incurred with that intention: for instance, expenditure incurred in making up roads to improve properties. It is submitted that the words 'on the asset' be reconsidered.

15. It should be made clear in paragraph 13 that bad debts and irrecoverable amounts are deductible from consideration received in all cases, whether or not coming within this paragraph.

16. The Council asks for confirmation that the right of election for valuation on April 6th, 1965, conferred by sub-paragraph 24 (1) extends to trustees and personal representatives where a disposal is deemed to have occurred.

17. It is not clear why an election for valuation under paragraph 24 should be prohibited by sub-paragraph 24 (3) where there has been a part disposal. The prohibition could operate with unwarranted retrospective effect, for example on the adjustment of partnership shares in favour of an incoming partner. The Council submits that the position should be remedied.

Clause 22 – Losses

18. Under sub-clause 22 (6) compensation received for making good damage to an asset is not to rank as a disposal if a loss would result, but is to be taken into account on a subsequent actual disposal. It is not clear why there is a proviso preventing such losses being taken into account in the case of wasting assets.

Clause 23 – Death

19. The Council submits that any remaining excess of allowable losses over chargeable gains in the year of assessment in which death occurs should be available for carry-back and set-off against the deceased's chargeable gains for the three preceding years of assessment (instead of two years as in clause 23 (5)). This would be consistent with the treatment of terminal losses for income tax purposes.

20. Where chargeable gains or allowable losses have arisen to the personal representatives of an estate it is submitted that a legatee acquiring should be given the right to assume such gains or losses referable to assets comprised in his interest in the capital of the estate for the purposes of his own capital gains tax position.

21. Deeds of family arrangement varying the dispositions of property of which a deceased person was competent to dispose are to be treated as having been effected by the deceased if made within twelve months after his death. In the Council's view the period allowed is inadequate having regard to the length of time frequently needed to ascertain the residue of an estate (which is normally a necessary prelude to negotiations for a deed of family arrangement). It is submitted that the period of twelve months should commence to run from the date on which the residue is ascertained.

Clause 24 – Settled Property

22. A company carrying on the business of acting as a trustee is, by the proviso to sub-clause 24 (1), to be treated as non-resident if the settlor or testator of a trust administered by it was not domiciled, resident or ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom. It is not clear why the proviso does not apply to trustees other than bodies corporate: the Council submits that it should.

23. Sub-clause 24 (4) provides that on the termination of a life interest in all or any part of settled property the trustees shall be chargeable in respect of all the assets of the settlement by reference to their market value (except any to which some person then becomes absolutely entitled). The Council submits that if there is more than one life interest current in a settled property then only that proportion of the assets forming the settled property appropriate to the life interest which has terminated should be taken into account for capital gains tax purposes.

24. Under sub-clause 24 (7) any loss referable to settled property which cannot be allowed to a trustee is to be treated as a loss sustained by a transferee who becomes absolutely entitled. The Council submits that such transferee should have the right to elect to have any chargeable gain or allowable loss arising on the disposal dealt with for the purposes of his own capital gains tax position (including the alternative charge to tax provided by clause 20).

Clause 27 – Life assurance and deferred annuities

25. In his statement in the House of Commons on December 8th, 1964, the Chancellor said that sums received on the maturity or surrender of normal policies of life assurance would be exempt from gains tax. However, Clause 27 as drafted restricts the exemption to life assurance policies or contracts for deferred annuities effected by any person on his or her life or on the life of his or her spouse provided that the gain accrues to that person or his or her spouse or their children, or to the trustees of a settlement wholly or mainly for their benefit. Exemption is also given for policies or contracts taken out by such trustees. Gains on all other policies will apparently be chargeable. Thus policies taken out for the benefit of named dependants (other than wife or child), policies effected by companies on the lives of employees for the benefit of their dependants, and policies effected by partnerships on the lives of partners appear to be chargeable, although they are all normal types of policy. Moreover, there will be double taxation, in that any gain arising on the maturity or surrender of a policy is derived from the investment income and capital gains of the life fund of the company with whom the contract is made, and will already have been subjected to tax, including capital gains tax, in the company's hands. It is understood that it is not the intention to charge capital gains tax on employees and others insured under pension schemes, and the Council submits that this should be made clear by suitable amendment. The Council also submits that means should be found to give appropriate relief for tax already suffered by a life fund when a chargeable gain arises on maturity or surrender, and that there should be some form of exemption for policies in favour of named dependants besides wife and children.

Schedule 7 – Capital gains: miscellaneous rules

26. The Council submits that where the consideration for the transfer of a business to a company consists in part of either a loan account or loan capital, then the exemption from gains tax conferred by paragraph 8 of Schedule 7 should not be withdrawn (as provided by sub-paragraph 3) while the loan account or loan capital is kept in the company and used for the purposes of its business.

Clause 31 – Replacement of business assets

27. Under sub-clause 31 (1) a trader who disposes of business assets and reinvests the proceeds in his business may elect not to pay tax on any gain at that time only if the entire proceeds are used in acquiring new assets of the same class. In the Council's view the exemption is drawn too restrictively and will tend to impose a harmful rigidity. The Council submits that there should be free transferability between classes of assets, so that proceeds realized from the disposal of any class of asset used in its trade by a business should be exempt from gains tax to the extent that they are spent on any other asset to be used by the business for the purpose of its trade.

28. The relief for replacement of business assets given by sub-clause 31 (3) applies only if the acquisition of new assets takes place, or an unconditional contract for the acquisition is entered into, not later than one year after the disposal of the old assets. Bearing in mind, for example, present-day building difficulties it is submitted that the period of twelve months is too short and should be three years or such longer period as the Board may allow. The relief should similarly apply where the acquisition of the new assets takes place in contemplation of, but before, the disposal of the old assets.

29. If the classification of assets defined in sub-clause 31 (6) is to be retained the Council submits that all plant and machinery should be included under item 2 instead of only fixed plant or machinery.

Clause 34 – Unit trusts and investment trusts

30. The Council submits that sub-clause 34 (2) (6) should contain an exception, with an appropriate time limit, for cases where an investment trust involuntarily finds itself with more than 10 per cent by value of its investments in one company, for instance, by reason of a price increase on a take-over bid. It should also be made clear at what point of time the size of the holding is to be calculated.

31. Sub-clause 34 (2) defines investment trust, inter alia, as a company 'in which the public are, as shareholders, substantially interested', and which is not under the control of fewer than fifty persons. (Sub-clause 34 (2) (c)). It is not clear why the status of investment trusts for gains tax purposes should be so restricted: the Council submits that any investment trust which complies with the other conditions laid down in sub-clause 34 (2) should be permitted to apportion its net gains to its shareholders. If sub-clause 34 (2) (c) is to be retained as drafted the meaning of the words '. . . the public are, as shareholders, substantially interested . . .' should be made clear.

32. The meaning of sub-clause 34 (2) (d) is not clear and its interpretation will present difficulties in practice. The Council submits that the relevant wording should be amended to read 'that the company regularly retains not more than 10 per cent of its distributable income'.

Clause 38 – Non-resident trust

33. An effect of clause 38 (2) could be that a beneficiary may be liable to capital gains tax without having effective recourse to the trust assets, and may, in fact, not be in a position to discharge his liability.

Clause 40 – Valuation

34. Sub-clause 40 (8) provides that appeals in regard to the value of unquoted shares shall be heard by the General Commissioners. The Council submits that the taxpayer should have a right of appeal to the Special Commissioners.

Clause 41 – Interpretation and other supplemental provisions

35. In defining the meaning of the word 'control' in clause 41 (1) reference is made to section 256 of the Income Tax Act, 1952; it is however provided in Schedule 19 that section 256 is to be repealed after the year 1965–66.

36. The Council submits that it should be made clear that clause 41 (9) does not exclude as allowable expenses those actually incurred in valuation and determining liability to tax where assets are deemed to be sold and immediately re-acquired.

PART IV – TAXATION OF COMPANIES AND COMPANY DISTRIBUTIONS

Introductory observations

Groups of companies

37. The Council urges again, reiterating its earlier memorandum on the proposed corporation tax, that the existing profits tax provisions giving the option to aggregate profits and losses in groups of companies should be carried forward into the corporation tax legislation. Experience has shown that the subvention payment system does not adequately relieve all the situations that are liable to arise within a group of companies, and it must be expected that under corporation tax these anomalies will continue and perhaps grow in number. Group treatment has been found to work effectively for profits tax, and the Council submits that this facility should be extended to corporation tax.

Small companies

38. The Council adheres to the view that some form of abatement should be made available to take the place of the profits tax abatement provisions available to small companies. The omission of such provisions in the Bill means that the new scheme of taxation can, according to circumstances, bear relatively more heavily on a small company which wishes to distribute even a modest proportion of its profits than on a larger one.

CORPORATION TAX – GENERAL

(Clauses 42, 45, 47–50, 75, 76, 81, 83 and Schedule 18)

Clause 48 – Allowances of charges on income

39. The scheme of allowances for yearly and other interest is set out in clause 48. Its provisions are, however, modified, and in some respects contradicted, in the succeeding clauses, notably sub-clauses 49 (5), 50 (3) and 54 (8), making it difficult to arrive at any certain conclusions as to when the various categories of interest are to be allowed as deductions in computing profits, and when they are to be treated as charges on income. In the Council's view it would make the intention clearer if these provisions were set out in a single section, so that there would be no necessity to refer to other parts of the Bill.

40. It is submitted that the relief for charges provided in sub-clause 48 (1) should be given on an accruals basis (instead of on a payments basis) subject to safeguards with regard to eventual payment.

41. Sub-clause 48 (5) provides that interest paid to a non-resident is not to be allowed as a charge unless the paying company is resident and either (a) deducts income tax in accordance with section 170, Income Tax Act, 1952, or (b) is carrying on a trade and the conditions set out in section 138, Income Tax Act, 1952, are satisfied. The Council submits that these provisions should be extended to include those cases where tax is not deducted by arrangement with the Inland Revenue under a Double Taxation Agreement. (S.R. & O. 1946, No. 466.)

Clause 49 – General rules for computation of income

42. It is noted with regret that sub-clause 49 (3) preserves the present differentiation between income according to source, with different rules for computation. The Council considers this differentiation artificial and looks forward to the time when it will be possible to assess all forms of income on one basis.

Clause 81 – Transitional relief for existing companies on cessation of trade

43. There is to be a 'cessation allowance' in certain cases where before the end of a transitional period a company ceases to carry on a trade which it carried on before the introduction of corporation tax. The amount of relief is to diminish by stages, disappearing altogether if cessation occurs in 1971–72 or later. The Council submits that no time limit should be set on the availability of cessation relief, which should be given whenever cessation occurs (that is without a five-year limit) and without tapering off as the date of cessation becomes more remote from April 6th, 1965. The principle of a permanently available cessation relief was accepted in the White Paper A Scheme for an Accounts Basis for income tax on company profits (Cmnd. 2347).

Clause 83 – Interpretation

44. As a practical matter the adoption of the phrase 'financial year' to describe the fiscal periods for which rates of corporation tax are to be fixed is likely to give rise to confusion, since the phrase is well-established in commercial usage to mean the period for which an undertaking makes up its accounts. It would be preferable to adopt terminology which will clearly indicate the taxation context. Confusion may also arise from the use of the term 'financial year 1965' to describe a period ending in March 1966.

INCOME TAX ON DISTRIBUTIONS

(Clauses 43, 44, 78, 80, Part I of Schedule 10, and Schedule 11)

Clause 43 – Taxation of company distributions

45. Sub-clause 43 (5) provides that references to distributions shall not apply (except where specifically stated) to distributions made in respect of share capital in a winding-up. Section 25 (5), Finance Act, 1962, extends the operation of section 28, Finance Act, 1960 (cancellation of tax advantages from certain transactions in securities) to transactions combined with the liquidation of a company. The Council seeks an assurance that the Commissioners of Inland Revenue will not exercise their powers under section 28 so as to nullify the exemption contained in sub-clause 43 (5) quoted above.

Clause 44 – Tax on distributions received by United Kingdom company

46. Sub-clause 44 (2) provides that a surplus of franked investment income in any year can be carried forward and set against income tax due on distributions in a subsequent year. The distributions actually made in a year of assessment will frequently have been decided upon by reference to the income, including franked investment income, of an accounting period which falls wholly or partly within an earlier year of assessment. It is submitted therefore that it should be permissible to elect to carry back a surplus of franked investment income to be set against income tax paid on distributions in the preceding year of assessment.

47. An election for dividends to be paid in full without deduction of income tax may be made under sub-clause 44 (3) jointly by a parent company and its subsidiary or by members of a consortium. It is submitted that there should be a similar exemption for distributions other than dividends. It is further submitted that in respect of consortia exemption from deduction of income tax from dividends paid should not be restricted to paying companies carrying on a trade.

48. No provision is made whereby a subsidiary or member of a consortium in respect of which an election has been made under sub-clause 44 (3) to pay dividends in full without deduction of income tax may obtain relief in respect of income tax suffered on distributions received. It is submitted that in such cases relief should be available under paragraph 3 of Schedule 11 either to the parent company or claimable against the gross distributions made by the subsidiary or member of the consortium. The position would be automatically remedied if the Council's submission in paragraph 37 that grouping provisions should be introduced in the corporation tax legislation were accepted.

Schedule 10, Part I – Meaning of 'distribution'

49. Interest on securities is to count as a distribution, inter alia, where the security was convertible into shares and was neither a quoted security nor a security issued on terms 'reasonably comparable' with quoted securities. (Sub-paragraph 1 (1) (d) (ii).) It is presumed that the words 'reasonably comparable' are intended to provide some allowance for non-marketability in connection with the terms of issue of securities by an unquoted company.

50. Interest on securities is also to count as a distribution where the consideration for the security was dependent on profits or was higher than the true commercial rate. (Sub-paragraph 1 (1) (d) (iii).) It is submitted that a reasonable rate of interest or the minimum rate specified by the terms of issue should be allowed as a charge, even though the full consideration is dependent on results.

51. Interest on securities issued to a non-resident company which has control over the issuing company, or which is jointly with the issuing company under the control of the same person, is to rank as a distribution. (Sub-paragraph 1 (1) (d) (iv).) The effect will be to induce companies to borrow otherwise than from an overseas parent. The Council submits that it would be proper to allow as a charge in such circumstances a reasonable commercial rate.

Schedule 11 – Supplementary provisions about tax on distributions

52. Sub-paragraph 4 (1) of Schedule 11 provides that income tax on distributions under the Schedule shall be due on the day following the issue of the notice of assessment, and sub-paragraph 4 (3) withdraws the remission of interest on tax less than three months overdue (and on assessments for less than £1,000) granted by the Income Tax Act, 1952, section 495. It would seem that assuming the normal postal service is used for the dispatch of the assessment notice and the remittance, it would be impossible to avoid the accrual of interest, even by immediate attention to the demand. The Council submits that a reasonable interval of, say, one month should be allowed to elapse before interest on overdue tax becomes chargeable.

53. In regard to the election for dividends to be paid in full without deduction of income tax under clause 44 (3), sub-paragraph 5 (2) provides that an election should have effect from the beginning of the year of assessment following that in which it is made, and should not have effect until the inspector is satisfied that the election is validly made. Inevitably there will be delays in some cases before the inspector can give notice that an election is validly made, and the Council submits that allowance should be made for this factor. In the Council's view an election should have effect from the beginning of the year of assessment in which the election is made, not the beginning of the year following.

Clause 78 – Dividend increases in 1965–66

54. Clause 78 goes much beyond the objective stated on page 29 of the White Paper, i.e. to discourage 'forestalling' such as might occur if a company paid an extra dividend just before April 5th, 1966, and reduced or omitted a dividend that would normally have been paid after that date. The Council is in no doubt that if the clause is enacted in its present form substantial inequity will result in many cases.

55. Some of the more obvious cases in which such inequity will arise are as follows:

(a) A company's profits for the year ended December 31st, 1964, showed an increase of 75 per cent over the profits for 1963 and the directors had already announced in April 1965 a dividend payable in May increased by about 40 per cent as compared with 1963. Provisional calculations, based on the provisions of clause 78 and on a computation of the standard amount and estimates of the profits for the financial year 1965, indicate that the increase in dividend will cost the company up to £50,000 in additional income tax.

(b) Shares of a company with a very modest dividend record were placed on the stock-market early in 1964 on the basis of a prospectus which forecast substantially increased dividends in 1965 and later years. The increase will clearly be caught by clause 78 as at present drafted.

(c) A 'surtax company' may well need to agree to pay an increased dividend in 1965–66 in order to avoid a surtax direction under section 245, Income Tax Act, 1952, and would clearly be caught by clause 78 as it now stands.

(d) Since companies in a group are to be dealt with separately, an increase in dividend by one subsidiary will not be offset against a reduction in dividend by another.

(e) Since the calculations required by clause 78 are based on the years in which (and not for which) dividends are paid, a late or early date of payment of dividend in respect of the standard years could have an entirely capricious effect on the standard amount; for instance, only two and a half years' dividends might have been paid in the three years comprising the standard period. Moreover, there is no necessary relationship between the standard dividends and the standard profits.

(f) A company may need for good financial reasons to maintain the dividends which it pays in 1965–66 at the level of those paid in the previous year, even though its profits are reduced, but it may be penalized by clause 78 as now drafted.

(g) In the case of overseas trade corporations it appears that exempt trading income will not be included in arriving at the standard profits.

56. The Council therefore submits that the scheme of clause 78 needs to be drastically altered so as to limit the effect to the intention stated in the White Paper.

57. The Council submits that the following points should, inter alia, be taken into account and dealt with by means of suitable amendments.

(a) In the absence of the grouping arrangements proposed by the Council in paragraph 37, a group of companies should be allowed to elect that the standard amount of the principal company should be calculated on a group basis. Provision should be made to cover group reconstructions which have taken place between the commencement of the standard period and the end of 1965–66.

(b) Arrears of preference dividends paid should be excluded for all purposes of the section.

(c) In the Council's view it is unrealistic to fix the standard amount by reference to a rate of 5 per cent at a time when the Bank rate is in excess of that rate (sub-clause 78 (3) (a)). The position should be brought into line with current conditions. Where capital includes preference share capital carrying a right to a fixed dividend in excess of 5 per cent, the rate should be increased accordingly. Again, since the share capital of a company usually bears no relation to the amount of capital employed, the percentage should be applied to the aggregate of the share capital and reserves. A similar standard was available to companies for the purposes of excess profits levy (section 38 (4) (c), Finance Act, 1952). Finally, all companies should be allowed to elect for an alternative standard amount equal to one-half of the amount of the profits (after deducting prior charges) of the financial year 1965.

(d) Profits for the purposes of sub-clause 78 (7) should be increased by the amount of any deductions made in computing the profits tax profits for investment allowances, scientific research allowances, development district free depreciation and losses brought forward.

(e) Special provision should be made in the case of overseas trade corporations to include exempt trading income in the profits as computed for the purposes of profits tax.

(f) Where a company has been subjected to a surtax direction during the relevant period the amount deemed to be apportioned to the members should be regarded as a distribution for the purpose of computing the standard dividend.

Clause 80 – Transitional relief for companies paying dividends out of pre-1966–67 profits

58. The relief given under clause 80 for companies paying dividends out of pre-1966–67 profits appears complicated and unduly restrictive. It is not clear why the relief should be confined to the three years from April 5th, 1966, or to the income tax borne in the three years up to that date. The Council submits that a simpler basis of relief could be effected by prescribing a method such as that adopted for overseas trade corporations in determining whether a dividend is paid out of profits earned in a pre-O.T.C. period.

CLOSE COMPANIES

(Clauses 69–74, Schedule 10, Part II, and Schedule 17)

Schedule 17, Part I – Supplementary provisions about close companies – Interpretation generally

59. Sub-paragraph 1 (3) (a) of Schedule 17 provides that a company is not to be treated as a close company if it is a subsidiary of a company which is not itself a close company, and sub-paragraph 1 (3) (b) limits this exception to cases where such subsidiary cannot be treated as a close company except by taking as one of the participators a company which is not a close company. It is submitted that sub-paragraphs 1 (3) (a) and 1 (3) (b) should provide separate alternatives (i.e. the word 'and' at the end of 1 (3) (a) should be amended to 'or').

60. Paragraph 2 of Schedule 17 provides that a company is an 'associated company' of another at a given time if at that time, or at any time within one year previously, one controls the other or both are under the control of the same person. The Council questions the necessity to govern the tax status of a company by reference to expired circumstances and submits that the reference to 'any time within one year previously' should be deleted.

61. The extensive definition of 'control' in Schedule 17 will in future be applicable to all companies, whereas hitherto the most nearly comparable provisions, in Part IX, Chapter III of the Income Tax Act, 1952, have been restricted to investment companies. This may have unlooked-for effects on financial management and policy. In particular the inclusion of a loan creditor, as defined in sub-paragraph 4 (2), as a participator may well inhibit the necessary financing of trading business from legitimate independent sources other than banks. Again, if a company purchases machinery on credit it may constitute the supplier a participator, involving the treatment of interest charges etc. as distributions. The Council submits that at the minimum loan creditors should be excluded from the definition of participators in the case of trading companies.

62. Paragraph 5 defines 'associate' and sub-paragraph 6 (3) defines a 'whole-time service director'. The definition of associates of a director (for the purpose of deciding whether or not he is a whole-time service director) is so widely drawn that it seems certain to produce unreasonable effects: for instance, through a combination of the circumstances defined in sub-paragraphs 5 (c) and 6 (3) the tax status of a whole-time service director might be prejudiced if he has an otherwise wholly unexceptionable interest in a trust for the benefit of employees generally and the trust holds even a smaller proportion of the close company's shares.

Schedule 10, Part II – Meaning of 'Distribution' – extended meaning for close company

63. Paragraph 9 of Schedule 10 extends the meaning of 'distribution' in relation to close companies so that it includes payments to participators or their associates of loan interest, annuities or other annual payments and rent, royalties, etc. (except rent at a commercial rate for the use of tangible property and in certain cases interest payable to a public company). The treatment as a distribution of interest paid by a close company to a participator necessarily involves its disallowance as a charge on, or deduction in computing, income for the purpose of liability to corporation tax (sub-clauses 48 (2) and 49 (5)). It is by no means impossible for the interest payable to represent such a high proportion of the company's gross income that, after payment of corporation tax, insufficient income will be left to enable the company to meet its obligation for interest, let alone offer any return on the risk capital invested. This is a position likely to arise, for instance, in the case of a property investment company if a high proportion of the cost of acquisition of its property has been financed by borrowing in one form or another. The lender may be a participator merely by virtue of that lending, or he may have a minor interest in the share capital of the borrowing company. In either event, a wholly unreasonable burden is placed on the other shareholders. Such relief as is offered by sub-paragraph 9 (4) will be taken away in these cases by the proviso to that sub-paragraph. The Council considers that the exception made in respect of rents etc. on tangible property (which provides that there shall be treated as a distribution only so much of the rent as represents more than a reasonable commercial consideration) should be extended to include loan interest, annuities and other annual payments and rents and royalties paid in respect of intangible property (e.g. patents), to the extent that they do not exceed a reasonable commercial consideration. For instance, where a close company pays to a participator loan interest at the same rate as would have to be paid to a lender at arm's length, there appears to be no reason why that interest should not be allowed as a deduction from profits instead of being treated not only as non-allowable but also as a distribution.

64. Paragraph 9 of Schedule 10 also extends the meaning of 'distribution' in relation to close companies to include expenses incurred by the company in providing benefits in kind for participators or their associates (unless the benefits are taxable as emoluments under Schedule E or are incurred in providing death or retirement benefits for a director or employee). The Council submits that it is undesirable to include for this purpose persons who are only remotely connected as associates of a participator, for instance a works manager who must live on the premises but who happens to be related to a participator, or, in respect of the expenses of a sales mission, a sales representative related to a participator.

Clause 69 – Restriction for close companies on deduction for directors' remuneration

65. The Council regrets that it has been decided to retain the limitations as presently imposed for profits tax on the remuneration, loan interest, etc., of directors of controlled companies. The far more extensive definition of close companies which will succeed the existing legislation applying to controlled companies may affect a number of large and highly efficient companies at present excluded from the rules restricting directors' remuneration. The amounts to be allowed are entirely out of keeping with comparative current levels of management remuneration, both in industry and Government service. The Council is disturbed by the fact that the new restrictions would seem, particularly in the case of many competitively-run close companies, to constitute in effect an impost on the cost of obtaining high-grade management. In the Council's view it would be preferable to allow such reasonable remuneration as is wholly and exclusively laid out for the purposes of the trade, without any specific restriction as to amount. Failing this, the definition of a close company should for this purpose be restricted to companies which are under the control of participators who are directors, and in those cases the amounts of allowable remuneration should be raised to a level more in keeping with present-day circumstances.

66. The Council further submits that where, during an accounting period, there are changes in directors or in the tax categories to which directors belong the permitted amount of directors' remuneration should be apportioned on a time basis.

Clause 72 – Shortfall in distributions of close company

67. Close companies are to pay income tax at the standard rate on profits withheld from distribution to the extent that they fall short of a prescribed standard. Until they have been assessed on any shortfall, and have lodged an appeal under sub-clause 72 (5), the case for withholding distributions, on the grounds that to make them would prejudice the requirements of the business, cannot be presented. The Council submits that, on administrative grounds, there should be machinery for agreeing a revised shortfall with an inspector before the matter proceeds to assessment and appeal.

68. It appears that the prescribed standard will apply for the purpose of determining whether there has been a shortfall in distributions even if a close company has losses brought forward from previous years. The Council submits that it should be made clear that current profits applied to make good past losses shall not be taken into account for the purpose of arriving at the amount of the prescribed standard.

69. Where there is a shortfall the proviso to sub-clause 72 (2) provides for the tapering relief for the small trading company which is not associated with another company. Where there are two associated companies the relief permitted by the proviso will not apply, and neither company will be allowed any relief unless a shortfall is specifically allowed by the Commissioners under sub-clause 72 (5). It is submitted that the relief permitted by sub-clause 72 (2) should be allowed proportionately, the tapering off provisions being related to the total estate of trading income of the two (or more) companies. Failing this, companies which do not perform any trading or other function, or which are insignificant in this respect, should be excluded from the definition of 'associated company' for this purpose.

70. Sub-clause 72 (4) limits the required distribution standards of a company which is subject to statutory limitation of its dividends to the maximum permitted by the Statute. It is submitted that restrictions imposed by contract (e.g. as a condition for the granting of finance or credit facilities) should have a similar limiting effect.

71. Sub-clause 72 (7) gives relief where income tax has been paid on a shortfall and in a later year more than the required standard is distributed. The relief is available only so long as the company remains a close company. In the Council's view this seems an unreasonable limitation, and it is submitted that the restriction should be relaxed by suitable amendment.

Clause 73 – Apportionment for surtax of close company's income

72. The Council seeks assurance that it is not intended to treat as apportionable for surtax purposes under sub-clause 73 (2) payments of bona fide pensions to past employees or their dependants made under settlements which would fall to be treated as income of the settlor under clause 12.

73. It is submitted that for the words 'where an apportionment is made by virtue of subsection (3) above' at the beginning of sub-clause 73 (6) there should be substituted the words 'where an apportionment is made by virtue of this section'.

Schedule 17, Part II – Provisions specially related to shortfalls in or apportionment of distributions

74. Paragraph 7 of Schedule 17 defines terms such as 'distributable profits', 'distributable income', 'distributable investment income' and 'estate or trading income' but it is not made clear how charges and other deductions from total profit are to be apportioned between the different categories. The Council submits that the treatment should be defined.

75. The definition of distributable profits is such that no allowance is given for a trading loss incurred in the accounting period to the extent that it exceeds income chargeable to corporation tax. Any franked investment income (less the deduction specifically authorized in sub-paragraph 7 (1) (b) will therefore be regarded as available for distribution, notwithstanding that it has been absorbed by a trading loss. The Council submits that this anomaly should be rectified.

76. It is submitted that provision should be made in paragraph 9 for a waiver of a loan (sub-clause 70 (3)) and consideration for restrictive covenants (clause 71) to be treated as distributions.

LOSSES AND CAPITAL ALLOWANCES

(Clauses 52, 54–57, 59, Schedules 13 and 14)

Schedule 14 – Miscellaneous adaptations of Income Tax Acts for corporation tax.

77. It appears from sub-paragraph 9 (2) (b) of Schedule 14 that, in determining a 'deficit' or 'surplus' for subvention payment purposes, regard shall be had, inter alia, for capital allowances of the accounting period concerned. This is a variation from the 1953 legislation which required capital allowances to be taken for the year of assessment in which the accounting period ends. It seems that in the transition period one year's capital allowances will not be effectively relieved under a subvention paid under the proposed legislation. Some measure of relief could be obtained if in relation to the accounting period ending on or immediately before April 5th, 1966, a claim could be based on either the capital allowances for that period, or those for the year of assessment 1965–66, at the option of the companies concerned.

INVESTMENT COMPANIES AND CHARGEABLE GAINS

(Clauses 51, 53, 58, 63, 77 and Schedule 12 and Schedule 19, Parts IV and V)

Clause 63 – Unit trusts and investment trusts

78. Clause 63, which establishes the method whereby holders in unit trusts and shareholders in investment trusts obtain relief from double taxation under clause 34 (1), is obscure as to the manner of its operation. The Council requests that detailed official guidance as to the operation of its provisions should be published when the Act comes into force.

Clause 77 – Interim charge of tax on capital gains of companies

79. While Clause 77 provides relief for losses brought forward, inter alia, under Case VII in respect of the limited class of companies which are for any period in 1965–66 not within the charge to corporation tax in respect of any of their income, the other provisions of the Bill do not appear to provide any relief for Case VII losses brought forward by companies outside the scope of sub-clause 77 (1), although such companies will comprise the more numerous class. The Council submits that the position should be made clear and remedied as necessary.

OVERSEAS COMPANIES, DOUBLE TAXATION RELIEF, SPECIAL CLASSES OF COMPANY, ETC.

(Clauses 46, 60, 61, 62, 64–68, 79, 82 and Schedules 15 and 16)

Overseas trade corporations

80. Following the enactment of legislation relating to overseas trade corporations in 1957, a number of companies were attracted into residence in the United Kingdom. The Council submits that there should be general Treasury consent, waiving the relevant provisions of Section 468 of the Income Tax Act, 1952 (which makes it an offence for companies to remove their residence outside the United Kingdom without Treasury consent), for overseas trade corporations which were non-resident before the coming into effect of the Finance Act, 1957, to resume their non-resident status.

Schedule 15 – Double taxation relief and overseas trade corporations

81. Paragraph 6 of Schedule 15 directs that on ceasing to be an overseas trade corporation a company shall be treated as having begun to carry on a new trade. This should not be interpreted as denying the company relief for expenditure incurred after the change of status, but referable to a period before it (vide Law Shipping Co v. C.I.R. (1923)) and the Council submits that the paragraph be made explicit on this point.

82. Sub-paragraph 7 (2) purports to give the same relief to a former overseas trade corporation under the transitional relief provisions of the Bill as if it had not been an overseas trade corporation. It is submitted that the words 'and profits tax' should be inserted after 'income tax' on line 17.

Double Taxation relief

83. The Council submits that further consideration should be given to the suggestion in its January 1965 memorandum that it should be permissible for companies to aggregate all overseas income and tax thereon so that rates which are in excess of the rate of United Kingdom corporation tax may be offset against those which are lower.

Clause 79 – Transitional relief for existing companies with overseas trading income

84. Clause 79 gives transitional relief for existing companies with overseas trading income and is, in the Council's view, unduly restrictive. For instance, in sub-clause 79 (1) overspill of overseas tax is calculated by reference to base years 1962–63, 1963–64 or 1964–65, whereas the detriment suffered by a company under the new tax structure should be measured by the actual overspill of 1966–67 et seq. Sub-clause 79 (2) further limits the relief where the dividend paid in the base year selected is higher than the dividend of the preceding or succeeding year. This restriction is presumably intended to block any tax avoidance arrangement, but would seem to be unnecessary since the dividends will have been paid before the provisions of the Finance Bill were known.

85. Sub-clause 79 (4) further restricts relief where the dividend paid in the year of relief exceeds the dividend in the base year (which may already unreasonably have been cut down under sub-clause 79 (2)). On the assumption that a company's profits should increase from year to year it is not unreasonable to expect that, in the ordinary course of business, the dividend in the year of relief would normally have been higher than in the base year. Since, having regard to the balance of payments, it would seem to be in the national interest to encourage the payment of high dividends on their overseas investments of United Kingdom companies, the Council submits that overspill relief should not be reduced by four-fifths of the excess of the dividend in the year of relief over the dividend of the base year. Instead it is submitted that the relief should be the lower of:

(a) the actual overspill of the year of relief without regard to base years, and

(b) the United Kingdom tax attributable to the proportion of the dividend which the overseas income with the overspill bears to the total income of the company.

Schedule 15 – Double taxation relief and overseas trade corporations

86. Sub-paragraph 3 (2) of Schedule 15 contains a direction that, in computing the limit of credit for foreign tax to be allowed, each source of income shall be dealt with separately and successively, but that the total income is to be taken as excluding the income to which the computation has already been applied. The Council is in doubt about how it is intended this provision shall operate in practice and asks that the treatment be made clear.

87. In connection with double taxation relief generally, the Chancellor announced in his Budget statement his intention to re-negotiate certain double taxation agreements. The Council hopes that opportunity will be taken to make the arrangements specified in section 17, Finance Act, 1961, with regard to exemption from foreign taxation to promote development. In the absence of these arrangements, the relief afforded by that section has been ineffective in a number of territories.

MORE ADVICE FOR ACCOUNTANTS

IN our issue of November 28th of last year, we commented at some length on a criticism of the accountancy profession by a writer in The Economist. Many of our remarks on that occasion would also answer Mr Desmond Goch, A.A.C.C.A., who contributes a constructive, if somewhat subjective, article on the same theme to the May number of Scientific Business, a Thomson publication which appears quarterly. Mr Goch, however, after running through the usual factors – the inflexibility of financial accounts and the alleged inadequacies of the historical cost basis of recording among them – which create grave inconsistencies between 'the very widely held view that a balance sheet is a statement of value and the accountant's traditional concept of it as an account of stewardship', goes on to raise two less familiar charges well worthy of examination.

One concerns the relationship between unit costs and pricing policy. Mr Goch thinks that accountants attach too much importance to textbook theories that total costs should always be recovered in the selling price. He suggests that supply and demand are the criteria and that, on occasion, a partial contribution to standing charges may certainly be better than none at all providing that management is watchful that, in the long term, all expenditure on all products is adequately covered by all receipts from all products.

Mr Goch's other point is that the probable return from new capital investment may be much more accurately gauged if discounted cash-flow techniques are employed in the preliminary financial planning. This method of evaluation, he states, places a relative value on the preference for cash now rather than cash at some future date so that competing projects may be ranked according to the timing of their cash flows.

While he does not suggest that these aids to scientific management are unknown to accountants, Mr Goch does think that the principles of marginal costing and discounted cash flows might be much more widely understood than at present and he concludes uncompromisingly by casting doubt on the competency of any accountant who has not the technical expertise needed to advise management on their application.

COLD SPRING FOR INCOMES POLICY

IT has been a bleak spring for Mr Brown's incomes policy. Between March and April, the official index of retail prices went up by 2·1 per cent, with an automatic effect on wages in those industries whose workers have wage contracts tied to the index. In May, a 6 per cent increase for shopworkers in the retail Co-operative Societies movement may have created a precedent for other (and better paid) shopworkers. Also in May, London busmen were offered about a 7 per cent pay increase. Other significant increases have recently occurred, notably the large rise for postmen, and powerful unions have already taken up bargaining positions for future claims.

On a more long-term view, however, there may be some comfort (comparatively cold though it may be) in successful negotiations of productivity arrangements between unions and individual firms. In the past such negotiations between unions and industries have had a poor response in practice, however high-sounding they may have seemed when negotiated.

Right at the end of May it was announced that Imperial Chemical Industries Ltd was trying to negotiate a new wages structure involving the ending of restrictive practices. The management and the union are taking as their starting point the productivity clause of the Joint Statement of Intent on Productivity, Prices and Incomes which was recently subscribed to by the employers' organizations and the Trades Union Congress. These negotiations will take some time and meanwhile the unions are not stopped from submitting an ordinary pay claim. Such agreements to negotiate are small crumbs of comfort perhaps, but at least they indicate (and there have been one or two other gestures similar to the I.C.I. negotiations) that the joint statement is being taken seriously in some quarters by both sides of industry.

RATING AND THE INLAND REVENUE

THE Court of Appeal on Tuesday dismissed an appeal brought by the Peachey Property Corporation Ltd from a decision of the Divisional Court. Peachey sought (a) an order of mandamus directed to the Paddington (now Westminster) Valuation Officer to carry out his statutory duties in the preparation of the valuation list for rating purposes and (b) an order of certiorari to quash the valuation list which came into force on April 1st, 1963. It now rests with Peachey to appeal against rating assessments on its own properties. Lord Denning and Lord Justice Salmon were of opinion that Peachey had not made out that the valuation list was void.

Lord Justice Salmon said it was not enough to show that the list contained many mistakes due to ineptitude, carelessness and a stubborn incompetence on the part of the Valuation Officer and those in authority (the Inland Revenue) over him. If it were enough, Peachey might well succeed. Lord Justice Danckwerts, dissenting, said that the Inland Revenue forms were extraordinarily inept and most unlikely to produce essential information on the matters on which the Valuation Officer ought to be informed. One of the complaints was that purpose-built flats were consistently valued at 20 per cent more than their actual rents, and conversion flats at 20 per cent less than their actual rents.

MORE FINANCE BILL CONCESSIONS

THE Treasury on Wednesday published a memorandum announcing an extension in the transitional relief which the Finance Bill gives to companies taxed overseas. The present relief under Clause 79 provides for money to be paid to these companies to help them maintain their dividends for a short time, in spite of their heavily increased tax burden. The sum paid was to be the least of three alternatives, viz.,

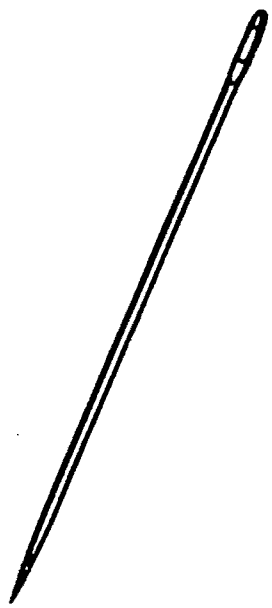
(a) a proportion of the amount by which the tax credit given in the base year exceeded the credit that would have been given if corporation tax had been chargeable;

(b) the unused credit for overseas tax in the year of claim;

(c) tax paid in the year of claim in respect of dividends coming out of overseas profits.

The proportion in (a) is that which the distributed profits bore to total profits. Full relief was to be given for 1966–67 and 1967–68 only; tapering down to nothing in 1971–72.

Now, the full amount will run until 1968–69 and will taper to nothing in 1972–73. Moreover, the amount in (a) will be the full credit for overseas tax in the base year. There are other concessions in favour of groups and overseas trade corporations. The memorandum includes details of the necessary amendments to the Bill which will be moved by the Government to give effect to the changes. They cover three and a half foolscap pages.



GILT-EDGED CONFUSION

A SUDDEN and unexpected announcement by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on May 26th, threw the gilt-edged market into utter confusion on the following day and caused a suspension of dealings. This was hardly calculated to help the £ sterling abroad. One of the criticisms of the capital gains tax is that in so far as it taxed the profit on redemption of Government securities it is in effect a breach of faith, because so many will have bought these securities before there was any question of taxing this gain, and indeed the price in the market was arrived at on the footing that the gain on redemption would be tax-free. The Chancellor announced that the zone between issue price and redemption price would be freed from tax. He would not extend the zone downward to the price (below issue price) at which stock was actually disposed of by the Government. This sudden and apparently little premeditated change seems to have created even more anomalies. Perhaps it will be reconsidered when the necessary amendment is formulated and proposed on the Report stage of the Finance Bill.

FUTURE POPULATION OF THE UNITED KINGDOM

ESTIMATES of population trends are vital for the long-term planning of capital investment. The size of household, numbers of children and so on are the material from which forecasts must be compiled of available manpower in the future and of the demand which is likely to arise for new houses and schools. Indeed the whole of the capital investment programme for the social services is involved.

In the May issue of Economic Trends, published last week, an article appears projecting the population of the United Kingdom over the next forty years. Mortality rates are expected to decrease at about the same pace as over the last half century. It is assumed that there will be a net inward movement of population from abroad of 20,000 a year but this is considered only an approximate estimate. It is assumed (and these assumptions are discussed in greater detail in the article) that the spinsters' marriage rate at ages under 22 will remain steady for some years and then increase. It is expected that ultimately less than 10 per cent of women will be single at 30. On the critical issue of size of families, it is assumed that fertility rates will produce an average family of 2·39 for 1955 marriages and 2·62 for 1964 marriages. For later marriages it has been assumed that the Transport operation without capital outlay?

CD gives you economy from the start

Switch your fleet to Contract Depreciation to achieve a new, consistent economy in transport operation. With the CD system capital outlay is eliminated—yet each truck comes to you new and you have all the tax reliefs, including investment allowance, every time. And CD economy goes even further—with regular vehicle replacement, loss of use is virtually eliminated so that fleet profitability shows a very worthwhile increase.

Of no less importance, operating a modern and well kept fleet is a major factor in maintaining and increasing company prestige.

There are other major advantages of CD, already established for over 15 years:—

- Tailor-made contracts mean fewer idle trucks or part loads.
- Less maintenance and repairs require fewer skilled (and scarce) mechanics and reduced workshop space.
- Planned transport economy—you can accurately predict total transport costs well ahead.
- Quotations for tenders can be estimated more competitively.
- Unprofitable administration takes up far less of your time.

average family size will increase, but more slowly as time goes on. On the basis of these estimates the total population of the United Kingdom will have risen from 54·2 million in 1964 to 61·4 million in 1980 and to 74·7 million in 2,000. The proportion of children in the population will increase and the proportion of old people will rise until about 1980 and then fall.

These estimates are made somewhat tentatively and with good reason. Population forecasts, particularly fertility rates estimated before the war and immediately afterwards, have already been proved very wide of the mark.

TRANSACTIONS IN MOTOR-CARS

RESULTS are now available from the social survey, carried out in 1962 by the Government, on the sale and purchase of new and used cars. The information has been delayed by the large amount of work on the rest of the social survey and the figures are now, of course, four years old, being based on data for 1961, but they are nevertheless of considerable interest.

The sample investigation suggests that about 37 per cent of the aggregate purchase value of used cars was accepted by the Inland Revenue as business expenditure. An article in Economic Trends which

by an Industrious Accountant

CHAPTER 279

YOUNG Joe, the junior assistant in our costing department, looked more and more crestfallen as the talk progressed. 'I'm afraid I've had it, sir, if that's the money involved', he said gloomily. 'So much for trying to climb up the ladder'.

His problem was a simple one, but unfortunately it tends to be far too frequent in modern industry. He had come to us straight from school, with good O-level results, and after some preliminary years on routine stock-ledger work, was promoted to be a junior in the costs section. He was a good choice, improving steadily and producing first-class results; when we reviewed his annual appraisal report he seemed deserving of a rotational assignment up the ladder.

At this stage, however, his lack of general expertise reared its ugly head. His experience with us was good, but patchy; he knew little of book-keeping, much less of cost control, nothing of the principles of management accounting. He needed technical skill to buttress his energy and intelligence. I talked to him in fatherly fashion and his enthusiasm sparked off in response. He'd study for a qualification, he promised. He'd apply for registration as a student with the A.C.C.A., or I.C.W.A., then plan for tuition at the local technical college or a correspondence course – or both. There was room at the top!

His present depression arose from the arrival of the correspondence course prospectus. Tuition fees, it appeared, plus textbooks would tot up to about £50. Registration fees, student's initial and annual subscriptions, and exemption from preliminary exam. totalled a further tenner or more. 'Then there'll be postage and stationery and travelling to lectures, I suppose', he said despondently. 'It's rather a load'. It was, especially for a man who'd married recently.

In this day and age skilled manpower seems to me to be at least as good an investment for a company as buildings, and much longer in productive life expectation than factory plant – particularly when accountancy training obviates the hazard of obsolescence. We must adopt a policy of paying for employee training, I decided, feeling like Peter the Hermit preaching the Crusade, and went off hotfoot to Prinny, our personnel director, to enlist his support.

Prinny eyed me with coldly sapient stare at first, like some bemantled and paunching burgher preferring his bag of groats at home to a lance behind King Richard in Palestine, but he relented ultimately. To give him his due, he's had a soft spot for struggling youngsters ever since his destroyer was torpedoed off Malta. 'What'll it all cost?' he grunted, reluctantly.

Not much, we decided, when we worked out what might be probable with the small numbers involved. Assuming that we wouldn't consider any claim until an exam, or a part therof, was successfully surmounted (Prinny being adamant on this cautious safeguard), and that the approval of either Personnel and/or Accounts was formally sought and granted before any ambitious student was accepted as a candidate for reimbursement, then adequate control could be maintained. He'd be prepared to implement a scheme authorizing refund of up to one-third of cost, he commenced; when I'd said 'niggardly' twice, and 'penny-pinching' once, he upped the contribution to two-thirds maximum. But 'all-in cost' was the slightly elastic term we wrote into a notice for the staff's information, subject to the managing director's final approval.

It looked good, a direct and valuable incentive to self-improvement at minimum cost as a set-off against the long nights of stern devotion to textbooks on the aspirant's part, but Prinny had the last word. 'It won't cost us much, bearing in mind the number of poor devils who'll be ploughed', he warned me, 'but remember those that qualify will soon be looking for better jobs elsewhere. You'll be sorry for this soft-hearted philanthropic bilge when your protégés come beaming in to you in the years to come with resignations to take immediate effect'.

deals with the survey states that since the annual total of new registrations of cars increased by about half between 1960 and 1964 much of this growth of demand for new cars came from the personal sector with a decline in the proportion accepted as a business expense.

Business cars were usually larger than private cars, measured by engine capacity. Fifty-four per cent of business purchases of cars were over 1,400 c.c. whereas the corresponding proportion for private cars was 38 per cent. Of total new cars, nearly a quarter were bought for the distributive trades and the same proportion in manufacturing industries. The most important groups buying used cars were builders and the groups which included farmers and doctors.

Nearly all new cars were bought from dealers, only about 10 per cent being bought direct. The average price of a used car bought from a dealer was about twice the average price of a car bought from the private owner. There was evidence that the average profit margin on the sale of used cars was a modest one and that a substantial proportion of used cars were eventually sold at a loss by the dealer. The trade-in car accounted for, on average, about half of the cost of a new car bought with the trade-in.

Hire-purchase was used for 20 per cent of purchases of new cars and 40 per cent of used cars. Over 60 per cent of new car contracts in 1961 were for thirty-six months but only a quarter of used car contracts were of this length. Early settlement of hire-purchase agreements was common.

OPENING STOCK VALUATION

THE House of Lords on May 27th dismissed the excess profits levy appeal of Cyril Lord Ltd against the decision of the Northern Ireland Court of Appeal. The company bought stock at £543,540 and by December 31st, 1951, had written it down to £103,487 (the market value) because of slump. Unfortunately, that was the beginning of the excess profits levy period. The stock was sold in the levy period at much above the latter figure. The company sought in vain to compute its profits for excess profits levy purposes on the footing of bringing in the opening stock at cost instead of the lower market value.

Johnson Group Cleaners

WITH 1,773 branches and a turnover of £7,735,000, Johnson Group Cleaners Ltd, from whose accounts this week's reprint is taken, is one of the 'powers' in the dry cleaning industry. There are four operating companies covering an area from Aberdeen to Plymouth and also a group property holding company. Johnson Group Cleaners Ltd is purely a holding concern.

Dry cleaning is essentially an industry of properties, for the receipt of articles and deposits, and works for their cleaning and redistribution to branches. Property values are therefore of considerable moment and particularly in these days of intensive town and city development.

Mr Douglas Crockatt, chairman of the Johnson Group, makes the point that this process of town centre modernization, although producing 'substantial profits for developers, for local authorities and for property owners of long standing' is also 'vastly increasing the burden of rent and rates to retail trade'.

In the case of small shopkeepers and of service trades where turnovers are relatively low, this development 'bears harshly on old-established tenants and owners, frequently pricing them right out of central positions'.

Property Sales

The Johnson Group, Mr Crockatt says, is year by year being compelled to part with properties in sites where it would prefer to continue to trade undisturbed. Alternative premises are costly and hard to find and positions in the new shopping centres, many of which have to be taken, are extremely expensive for the dry cleaning trade.

As the profit and loss account shows in 'Profit on Realization of Capital Assets', property sales have realized over £195,000 in two years. A year ago there was a 1 per cent tax-free distribution to ordinary and employee shareholders at a cost of £29,000 and a 2 per cent tax-free distribution costing £64,000 has been made this year. Shareholders are warned that 'such exceptional distributions cannot be counted on in the future'.

The ten-year record included in the accounts – and in the reprint – shows that pre-tax profits in relation to turnover and also to capital and reserves have been relatively well maintained, and in relation to turnover there has been a fair saving in the number of employees in the group. The sharp twist to the cost spiral this year, however, would seem to make pressure on profit margins inevitable.

The accounts of Johnson Group Cleaners Properties Ltd are separately provided and the figures indicate that the properties' subsidiary does not by any means hold the group's entire properties which is not surprising in view of the group's pace of expansion.

In April last year the acquisition of Rapid Cleaners Ltd, and an associated company, added over thirty branches in the Middlesbrough area and a further five branches were added to the Leeds operating subsidiary by acquisitions in Scarborough. This year the Arbroath Laundry has been taken over and presumably there must be a time-lag between the transfer of properties from new operating subsidiaries to the properties subsidiary if, indeed, that is the basic policy.

A more pressing problem is any valuation of properties under conditions of town and city developments, and also under conditions of pressure on the profits stemming from the operation of other properties not necessarily threatened by building developments.

The equity of the properties company is wholly owned by Johnson Group Cleaners but there is a publicly quoted debenture stock. The company was originally formed in 1953 to acquire the properties of Johnson Brothers (Dyers) Ltd under a reconstruction scheme.

Function

The properties company's accounts show properties of £3,203,367 at cost, with freehold properties accounting for £2,986,176 of the total. Of the outstanding £1,636,141 of 4¾ per cent debenture stock, £396,361 was held by group companies at the accounting date – December 31st, 1964.

The comparative properties' figure in the 1963 accounts was £3,152,605 which hardly suggests any major transfer of group properties to the separate company. In fact one tends to wonder whether the separate properties company is fulfilling the originally intended function or whether growth in the group itself has overtaken the purpose for which it was formed.

The publicly held debenture carries redemption dates of 1969–83. Between January 1st, 1969, and December 31st, 1973, repayment of the debenture is at 105 on three months' notice. The debenture would seem to be something of an obstacle.

The company paid a net dividend of £17,456 to the parent from 1964 operations, having earned net profits of £38,186 against £38,971. The ordinary capital is £475,000.

CITY NOTES

THERE is still little sign or prospect of a return of stock-market confidence. The announcement of the changes in gains tax affecting Government stocks without, apparently, prior consultation with the Government broker and also the introduction of the changes on a Thursday, the very day in which the Government broker, for reasons of the Bank rate, is not expected to intervene in the market was hardly conducive to a warm reception of the Chancellor's move. The handling of the matter and the misconception of its base is typical of the chain of events with which the loss of confidence has been linked.

Turnover throughout the home sections of the stock-market remains small, with the industrial equity sections virtually devoid of worth-while support. If there is a business trend at present it is towards the sale of weaker equities where the dividend cover is already thin and where the prospect of better current-year earnings is none too bright.

The flow of high coupon industrial debentures continues and, provided the terms are right, the institutions are takers of this type of stock. But, at present, this would seem to be the extent of institutional interest in the market.

* * * *

THE move by the Leek & Moorlands Building Society to accept a narrower operational margin by putting up the Society's share investment rate to 4 per cent tax free has been followed by another move towards higher interest rates in the building society movement. The Leicester Temperance Building Society – with assets of £37 million – is introducing a 4½ per cent tax-free two-year term share and with it mortgages carrying 7 per cent interest for the first two years of their run.

Through this scheme the Society offers a high interest rate to investors, although not with the building society movement's normal ease of withdrawal, and at the same time does so without having to increase the rate of interest on outstanding mortgages. Within the scheme is the admission (which the movement as a whole has not so far made) that a borrower would prefer to pay 7 per cent for a mortgage than be rejected at 6¾ per cent because of the inadequacy of the Society's funds.

AS much as statisticians may attempt to work out the sums themselves, there is approval in the City of the manner in which many company chairmen are now stating the cost of corporation tax in figures.

This is undoubtedly a vital statistic in investment considerations now, and the figure can only be provided by companies themselves in the knowledge, in particular, of the effect of the tax on overseas earnings.

A figure for the cost of corporation tax can only be provided on the basis of past year profits but, since market calculations of earnings and cover are made on that basis, the retrospective rather than the prospective impact of the tax change is still of major importance in market calculations.

Credit and Smaller Companies

SIR, – In Weekly Notes in your issue of May 22nd, under the heading of 'Credit and Smaller Companies', you refer to the publishing by the Engineering Industries Association of its findings, based on a questionnaire to members, on the ratio of trade debts on a given date to turnover for the previous quarter. The Association had drawn the conclusion that 'there had been an alarming increase in the degree of credit taken at December 31st, 1964, as compared with previous results', and you had commented that the figures were not easy to interpret.

I have found in practice that the ratio of trade debt to turnover (although often all that it is possible to determine from information made available) is in fact an unreliable method of assessing the extent of credit taken by customers or, alternatively, the effectiveness of a company's credit and collection department. Too many special factors intrude for a really clear picture to emerge when these basic figures are used, even in businesses where seasonal factors can be totally ignored; and it must, moreover, be pointed out that December 31st, the date used for the statistics published, is a date notorious for many concerns to indulge in a little innocent 'window-dressing'.

A formula in common use in the United States – a country perhaps rather more commercial credit minded than we are – gives, in my opinion, a far clearer picture; producing results barely influenced by factors such as a rising or falling trend in sales or seasonal fluctuations in business. This consists of taking the ratio of trade debtors at the beginning of each month to collections for that month, and multiplying it by the number of calendar days in the month. The answer, in terms of days, is called the debtor turnover days for the month and, although subject to monthly fluctuations, is a reasonably accurate guide and will easily throw up any current trend. This is particularly so if an annual average is taken, calculated by taking the ratio of the sum of the trade debtor balances at the beginning of each month for a twelve-month period to the total collections for the period and multiplying by 30·5, being the average number of days in the month. For the purpose of the calculation, 'collections' includes cash received, cash discounts allowed, and credit journal entries for items such as accounts settled contra, bad debts written off, etc., but not credits passed for returns and allowances or similar normal trading items.

It would be most interesting to know what sort of picture would emerge if the Engineering Industries Association were to ask its members to supply information using this formula – possibly it might show that the trend which causes them concern set in much earlier than was realized.

Yours faithfully,

London W1. P. J. RICHARDS, F.C.A.

Tax Treatment: Married Women

SIR, – I was surprised to read, in your issue of May 22nd under 'Tax Topics', that 'as every practitioner knows, the married woman who is gainfully occupied is especially favourably treated under the income tax rules, bearing in mind that the principle of aggregation is ignored'.

As a practitioner, my understanding of the position until now has been that, up to joint earnings of £4,005, the married woman is placed in the same income tax position as a single person. Where is the especially favourable treatment?

To say that the principle of aggregation is ignored is surely incorrect, for it begins to have effect as soon as the joint earned income exceeds £4,005 a year. From my experience, where husband and wife are reasonably (and no more than reasonably) successful in their careers, this limit is quickly reached.

The above does not, of course, take into account the principle of aggregation for surtax purposes, where surtax is chargeable in respect of the joint income, regardless of whether the respective incomes of husband and wife would have attracted surtax and regardless of how much surtax the respective incomes would have attracted separately.

The matter will not be resolved by allowing married women to earn up to £520 a year free of tax or by confining such relief to this or that profession, or even by making an exception to the rule of aggregation for surtax purposes in the case of wives' earned income. These are not remedies, merely palliatives to lighten the burden of tax on a specific class of person. As such, they are fundamentally inequitable and do nothing to deal with the basic problem of the anachronistic position of married women in our system of taxation.

A married woman is now in the same position as a single individual in her ownership and enjoyment of her property. Why shouldn't the same principle be also applied in the taxation of her property?

Yours faithfully,

(Mrs) P. GRAHAM, A.A.C.C.A., A.C.I.S.

London NW1.

[It is quite true that the principle of aggregation applies to surtax paying couples. These taxpayers, however, constitute a very small minority compared with married working couples who do benefit from the present law. The latter benefit for the simple reason that, while the wife is treated as a single woman, the husband still gets the additional allowance as a married man. He also indirectly benefits from the fact that his wife gets a further set of reduced rate reliefs. We entirely agree with our correspondent that the anomalous position of the surtax paying couple will not be rectified by modest amendments, but only by a complete overhaul of the law. In view of the weight of taxation, as well as the importance of professional women whose services are lost to their profession through marriage, the sooner the law stops discriminating against them, the better. But there are even worse anomalies affecting the widow with young children, as the decision in Whiting v. Barentz ([1965] T.R. 1) demonstrates. – Editor.]

STOCK EXCHANGE ANNOUNCEMENT ON INTERIM REPORTS

In a letter to United Kingdom quoted companies, the Council of the Stock Exchange state that although the Council would prefer interim reports to be circularized to shareholders they have decided to give general permission for these statements to be inserted as paid advertisements in the Press.

The Council believe that the despatch of an interim report to each shareholder may in a number of cases cause various difficulties to companies and may tend to delay the issue of the report.

The new regulations will also apply to Government Stocks on the Dublin Register of the Bank of Ireland whereas the present regulations do not have this provision.

The existing provisions governing the transfer and registration of certain Government stocks and registered bonds are laid down in the Government Stock Regulations, 1943, as amended by the Government

Subsequently the Stock Transfer Act, 1963, prescribed a simplified transfer procedure which has made obsolete many of the provisions of the existing Government Stock Regulations. This simplified transfer procedure applied to Government stocks notwithstanding a contrary provision in the present Government Stock Regulations; the procedure is now expressly authorized by the new regulations.

The new regulations have to lie in draft before Parliament for forty days, during which time they are subject to annulment by negative resolution. They will come into operation on the day on which they are made.

UNIVERSITIES AND THE ACCOUNTANCY PROFESSION

A new edition of the booklet The Universities and the Accountancy Profession has been prepared on behalf of the Joint Standing Committee of the Universities and the Accountancy Profession and issued by The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales and The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants.

The booklet sets out details of the joint scheme under which it is possible to obtain within a period of five and three-quarter years both a university degree and a professional qualification. Information on the various degree courses available is set out and, for the first time, the reference numbers designated by the Universities Central Council on Admissions for each course included in the scheme are shown so that any candidate applying for a university through the U.C.C.A scheme has an easy numerical reference corresponding to that which appears in the U.C.C.A. handbook. The proposed University of Bradford (at present the Bradford Institute of Technology) is included in anticipation of its becoming a university in the course of this year; like all other colleges of advanced technology it came under the Universities Grant Committee for financial purposes from April 1st, 1965.

BIRMINGHAM AND DISTRICT SOCIETY OF CHARTERED ACCOUNTANTS

Mr W. R. Doherty, T.D., F.C.A., a partner in the firms of Cooper Brothers & Co, Coopers & Lybrand and Carter & Co, Chartered Accountants, of Birmingham, has been elected President of the Birmingham and District Society of Chartered Accountants for the year 1965–66.

Mr W. R. Doherty

Mr Doherty was articled to the late Alderman T. O. Williams, a former Lord Mayor of Birmingham. He joined the staff of Carter & Co in 1938 and became a partner in the firm in January 1947. On the amalgamation of the firms in January 1960 he also became a partner in Cooper Brothers & Co, and Coopers & Lybrand. Since his election to the committee of the Birmingham Society in 1958, Mr Doherty has held the appointments of treasurer, dinner secretary, assistant secretary, secretary and vice-president.

From September 1939 to January 1946, Mr Doherty, who had been commissioned into the Territorial Army some years before the Second World War, served mainly in the Far East. During his T.A. service, he had taken a keen interest in boxing and represented his division as a light-heavyweight; he later became a judge and eventually an Imperial Services referee.

Mr Doherty's interests in other sporting activities include badminton, at which he captained Worcestershire for several seasons and made some seventy consecutive appearances for the County, and rugby football, being chairman of the Moseley Rugby Football Club which he joined as a young player more than thirty years ago. He is also chairman of the Union Club, Birmingham.

Other new officers of the Society for the ensuing year are:

Vice-President: Mr P. G. Craven, T.D., F.C.A.
Hon. Secretary: Mr P. T. Neal, F.C.A., Messrs Agar, Bates, Neal & Co, 106 Edmund Street, Birmingham 3.
Hon. Assistant Secretary: Mr K. J. Milligan, M.A., F.C.A.
Hon. Treasurer: Mr A. S. Maddison, F.C.A.
Hon. Dinner Secretary: Mr R. F. Griffiths, F.C.A.
Hon. Librarian: Mr S. B. Jackson, F.C.A., J.P.

Annual Report

The eighty-third annual report shows that the total membership of the Society at December 31st, 1964, numbered 2,364, of whom 905 were members in practice, 1,443 members not in practice, and sixteen 'invited' members.

For the second year, the Society, in conjunction with the Liverpool Society of Chartered Accountants, held a joint week-end residential conference at Keele University last April (referred to in The Accountant of May 1st) which was attended by ninety members representing a wide cross-section of accountants in practice and industry. Six meetings held over the period from October 1964 to March 1965 were well attended, and the Society's two discussion groups, one for members in practice or employed in the profession and the other for accountants in industry and commerce, continued to meet during the year. On education within the profession, the report states that further progress has been made in arranging introductory courses for articled clerks at technical colleges and colleges of commerce within the Society's area and arrangements are being made to hold examination revision courses.

The Wolverhampton Branch, the Coventry Area Branch and the Stoke-on-Trent Area Branch all passed an active year and showed an increase in their respective memberships.

Mr N. G. Webber

Born in 1916, Mr Webber was educated at St Edward's School, Oxford, and was admitted to membership of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales in 1940 after serving articles with Ware, Ward & Co. During the Second World War he served in the Royal Corps of Signals with the Eighth Army in the Middle East and attained the rank of Captain. The annual report of the Committee for the year 1964 shows that total membership of the Society at December 31st was 1,210, of whom 475 joined during the year. There were 582 members in the Bristol Branch area, 306 in the Exeter and District Branch area, 194 in the area of the Cornwall and Plymouth Branch; and in the area of the Gloucestershire District Branch there were 128 members.

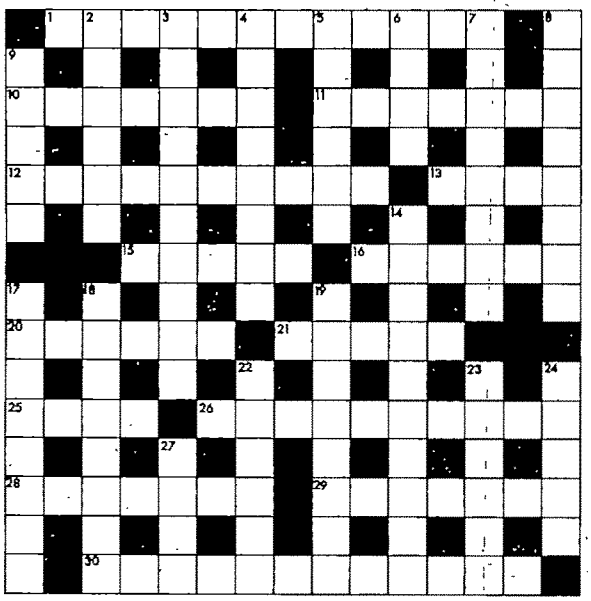
All branches were active during the year; in Bristol a number of evening meetings were arranged and there were also two luncheon meetings. In addition a Computer Discussion Group was formed. The Branch now has groups at Bridgwater, Swindon and Yeovil and each is represented on the Branch Committee. It is hoped that members in the outlying areas will now have a greater opportunity to meet fellow members in their locality.



Introductory courses for articled clerks were organized throughout the Society's areas for the first time during 1964 and they proved very successful. A well-attended residential course for articled clerks was again organized by the Exeter Branch.

Social functions included the Society's dinner held at the Grand Hotel, Bristol, the Bristol and District Golf Competition and branch dinners at Exeter, Newquay and Cheltenham.

The Committee extends its congratulations to Alderman K. A. P. Dalby, D.S.O., O.B.E., F.C.A., on his election as Lord Mayor of Bristol during 1964. Mr Dalby has been a member of the Institute and of the District Society since 1934.

Live wire with a high potential

We've often been called the 'liveliest wire in the building society world'. To earn a title like that takes years. But we worked at it. Thought ahead. Took progressive steps. Looked after our investors. And in the last ten years we've watched our assets multiply more than three-fold whilst the number of accounts has nearly doubled. In the next ten years we'll probably repeat the performance—and more! Because now, with the help of a super-efficient computer and a new administration centre, we've opened up the future. We could grow up to four times our present size and still cope easily with the expansion. Try testing us—with your investment.

Merging to advantage

Modern techniques in the age of automation often demand larger units in industry, to meet the needs of the home and foreign markets. Rationalisation by constructive mergers, to maintain a competitive position and achieve growth in exports, plays an essential part in the modernisation of Britain's industries. Kleinwort, Benson have unusually wide experience in handling the delicate negotiations involved. Many successful marriages have resulted, and inappropriate ones have often been averted. It is only common sense to make use of the advice of Kleinwort, Benson in take-over situations.

Is your present Pension Scheme completely flexible ?

When a company is growing rapidly, the staff situation tends to be more than usually fluid. Unfortunately many pension schemes are slow to react to changes, and staff relations can suffer as a result.

But with a privately administered pension plan, there need be no such time lag. This is the basis on which we work at Chase Manhattan. The pension plans we devise depend to a large extent for their effectiveness on a wise spread of investment and a minimum of administrative machinery. The result is complete flexibility.

Why not have a chat with us, let us show you how, in conjunction with an independent consulting actuary, a plan can be prepared to meet your precise requirements. You'll discover just what an advantage it is to have a friend at Chase Manhattan.

The Real Issue

THE interpretation of economic events, like the formulation of economic policy, is an art rather than a science. Such considerations, however, do not by themselves explain the variety of interpretations placed upon last week's one point reduction in Bank rate.

That the reduction was due, if not overdue, is hardly to be denied. In theory, high Bank rate attracts foreign funds and thereby supports the sterling exchange rate. In reality, the prospects for sterling more than outweighed any attractions the higher interest rates may have offered. Yet, at home, the 7 per cent rate was forcing local authorities to pay ruinous rates for their loans, without apparently persuading them to cut their capital spending, although at the same time it threatened the future level of industrial investment. It was the 'credit squeeze' rather than high interest rates which was helping to reduce the over-heating in the economy.

The simple truth is that despite one of the most intensive and protracted periods of credit restraint in post-war Britain, the economic situation is no better than it was at the outset. A modest improvement in the current balance of payments owes little to recent measures, although it has probably been accompanied by some encroachment upon the second line of the country's reserves, since the gold and foreign exchange reserves are now little more than £100 million in excess of the recent borrowing from the International Monetary Fund.

Much more significant for Britain's economic future than all the talk about five-year plans was the decision by British European Airways to dismiss workers who failed to abide by existing agreements and were not prepared to observe in future what in the past would have been regarded as normal labour-management relations. If this action marks the end of the era in which employers and Governments have persistently preferred to buy industrial peace at the expense of efficient deployment of resources, then there is indeed a ray of hope for the national economy.

It is also high time that the politicians started to explain the facts of economic life to the electorate. The present Government has two alternatives. Either it can, as some of its supporters would wish, pursue a full socialist policy aimed at a planned economy with attendant and extensive controls over incomes, investment, imports and capital. The alternative is to stop trying to run the economy at a level of 98·5 per cent employment as long as inefficient employers and selfish labour interests persist in enforcing restrictive practices which militate against the free working of the market mechanism.

CAPITAL GAINS TAX

General Charging Rules

WE discussed two weeks ago clauses 16 and 17 of the Finance Bill, which provided for the continuance of Case VII income tax liability on short-term gains. The cross-heading to these two clauses is 'Short-term capital gains' but neither the expression 'short-term' nor the expression 'capital gains' occurs either in those two clauses or in the legislation in the Finance Act, 1962, which first imposed tax on what we call short-term capital gains.

Part III of the Finance Bill, comprising clauses 18 to 41 and a number of schedules, now deals with what clause 18 (1) calls 'capital gains', without any epithet as to length. That sub-clause charges 'tax' in accordance with the Bill in respect of capital gains 'that is to say chargeable gains computed in accordance with this Act and accruing to a person on the disposal of assets'. The general charging rule contains no reference to acquisitions. Moreover Part III so defines 'disposal' as to make it scarcely recognizable.

We have seen that companies within the charge to corporation tax must under Part IV of the Bill, bring these chargeable gains into their corporation tax computations. Clause 18 (2) confirms this and directs that Part III is to be modified accordingly. Subject to this, clause 18 (3) provides for the assessing and charging of a separate tax to be called 'capital gains tax'. This is for the income tax year 1965–66 and subsequent years, in respect of chargeable gains accruing in those years. Capital gains tax, as such, will thus be chargeable on individuals. There is a special provision in clause 77 for companies which are not within the corporation tax charge in 1965–66, i.e. broadly speaking those companies the whole of whose income is assessed to income tax on the current-year basis for 1965–66. They pay a capital gains tax for that year at a special rate of 35 per cent. Apart from this, the rate of capital gains tax is 30 per cent, subject, in effect, to a reduction where the taxpayer does not pay surtax. This reduction is arrived at in a complicated manner under clause 20, the rubric of which speaks confusingly of an 'alternative charge'.

The general charging provisions make no mention of the Case VII charge on short-term gains. If one looked at those provisions alone, there would seem to be double taxation. However, concealed among the detailed provisions of Schedule 6 about the computation of chargeable gains is paragraph 3 (1) which provides that, subject to certain exceptions, a gain accruing on a disposal of an asset which is chargeable under Case VII of Schedule D is not to be chargeable gains for the purpose of Part III.

Paragraph 3 (1) is without prejudice to a more general provision in paragraph 2 (1) which excludes, from the capital gains tax computation, any receipts which are taken into account for the purposes of income tax. These out of the way provisions emphasize the difficulty of finding out what exactly the draftsman means by 'chargeable gains'. There is a simple definition in clause 41 (1) which says the phrase has the meaning given to it by clause 21 (10). However, clause 21 (10) is hardly more enlightening. It says that every 'gain' accruing after April 6th, 1965, shall be a chargeable gain. It does not say what a 'gain' is. Moreover it qualifies even this delphic utterance by inserting the words 'except as otherwise expressly provided by this Part of this Act' and adding 'but subject to the provisions of Part II of Schedule 6 to this Act'. To find out what a 'gain' is one must read clause 21 (9) which says that the amount of the gains accruing on the disposal of assets is to be computed in accordance with Part I of Schedule 6, but subject to Schedules 7 and 8.

Before delving into these muddy waters, it is necessary to deal with the more general provisions. The scope of the charge is not so wide as income tax, in that persons who are neither resident nor ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom for a particular tax year are not chargeable (clause 19 (1)). This is 'subject to any exceptions provided by this Act' – a phrase which seems to indicate that the draftsman does not know whether or not there are any such exceptions. However, there is an exception in clause 19 (2) aimed against a person carrying on a trade (in the income tax sense) in the United Kingdom, through a branch or agency. Presumably the branch or agency has to be here, but the clause is silent on that. Such a person is chargeable on chargeable gains accruing on the disposal

> '(a) of assets situated in the United Kingdom and used in or for the purposes of the trade at or before the time when the capital gain accrued; or
> (b) of assets situated in the United Kingdom and used or held for the purposes of the branch or agency at or before that time, or assets acquired for use by or for the purposes of the branch or agency'.

Paragraph (b) is thus in two parts. Assets in the second part apparently do not need to be situate in the United Kingdom, even if one is right in assuming that the branch or agency has to be here. 'Branch or agency' means any factorship, agency, receivership, branch [sic] or management, but does not include any person within the exemptions in section 373 of the Income Tax Act, 1952, in favour of general commission agents and brokers (clause 41 (1)). Clause 41 (1) also defines the 'principal' in relation to a branch or agency. This is because paragraph (b) of clause 19 (2) as originally drafted made liability of the second kind of asset dependent on the asset having been acquired by the principal. This restriction on liability was dropped at the committee stage, but the Government forgot to delete the definition of 'principal'.

Clause 39 (4) contains a lengthy special code for determining the situs of different kinds of assets, for the purposes of Part III. Presumably it is part of the Government's reforming zeal that assets are to be deemed to be in different places for the purposes of different taxes. Clause 19 (2) does not hit a person who, under some double tax agreement, is exempt from income tax chargeable for the year of assessment in respect of the profits or gains of the agency. In this context the word 'gains' does not have the meaning given to it by clause 21 (9). Clause 41 (10) provides that references 'in the Income Tax Acts' to profits or gains shall not include references to chargeable gains. There is no provision in the Bill that Part III is to be construed as one with the Income Tax Acts; only Part II is to be so construed.

Clause 19 (7) gives the benefit of the remittance basis to individuals who are resident or ordinarily resident, but not domiciled, in the United Kingdom, in respect of gains on assets situated outside the United Kingdom. The situs rules in clause 39 (4) will apply for this purpose also. The gains are to be treated as accruing as and when they are remitted here. Presumably if the individual has in the meantime become domiciled here, the remittance basis will still apply. Conversely, if he is neither resident nor ordinarily resident in the year of remittance there will be no charge on the remittance. Clause 19 (7) prohibits any allowance for losses 'accruing' in like circumstances. Gaps in clause 19 (7) are filled in by clause 41 (6) which directs that > 'there shall be treated as received in the United Kingdom in respect of any gain all amounts paid, used or enjoyed in or in any manner or form transmitted or brought to the United Kingdom'.

The odd thing about this form of words is that it does not in terms restrict the Revenue to taxing sums which have something to do with the overseas gain. Clause 41 (6) also brings in section 24 of the Finance Act, 1953, which was passed to thwart the device of borrowing money here and repaying the debt abroad.

Losses, computed in the same way as chargeable gains, and 'accruing' in 1965–66 or subsequently, are available for set-off against the loser's chargeable gains in the same or a subsequent year (clause 19 (4)). Where a married woman is living with her husband, any loss of either spouse which cannot be set off against that spouse's gains for the same year, can be set off against the gains in the same year of the other spouse, instead of being carried forward (clause 19 (5)). The test of whether a married woman is living with her husband is the same as for income tax in section 361 (1) (2) of the Income Tax Act, 1952 (clause 41 (3)).

Either spouse can exclude clause 19 (4) by notifying the inspector before July 6th following the end of the year of assessment. The notification is to be in the form laid down by the Inland Revenue. Moreover it would seem that a fresh notification must be made for each year. It is thus open to either spouse to retain a loss for carry forward, or to force the other spouse to retain a loss. The same period of three months following the year of assessment is allowed for the payment of the capital gains tax, unless this is earlier than the end of thirty days following the making of the capital gains tax assessment (clause 19 (6)).

CORPORATION TAX

Allowance of Charges – I

THE computation of a corporation tax assessment on 'profits' can be said to comprise four stages as follows:

(1) Computation of 'income' from each of several sources on income tax principles;
(2) Computation of 'chargeable gains';
(3) The aggregation of the items in (1) and (2);
(4) The allowance of a deduction 'against the total profits' for 'charges on income' (clause 48 (1)).

We referred on May 15th, to the draftsman's apparent confusion between 'profits' (defined in clause 42 (4) (b) as 'income and chargeable gains') and 'income' which, although not expressly defined, means income computed on income tax principles. The incorrect use of 'income' instead of 'profits' at the end of clause 45 (2), to which we drew attention, was corrected at the Committee stage on June 3rd. It is a pity that the phrase 'charges on income' is still used of sums which are deductible, not from 'income' but 'against the total profits'.

If a sum is to qualify for deduction under item 4 above it must satisfy the following requirements:

(a) It must be paid by the company itself;
(b) It must be paid in the accounting period;
(c) It must be paid after April 5th, 1966;
(d) It must be paid out of the company's profits brought into charge to corporation tax;
(e) It must fall within the basic definition in clause 48 (3) of 'charges on income';
(f) It must not constitute 'dividends or other distributions of the company' (clause 48 (2));
(g) It must not be deductible 'in computing profits or any description of profits for purposes of corporation tax';
(h) It must not be charged to capital (clause 48 (4) (a));
(i) It must be ultimately borne by the company (ibid);
(j) It must either be paid under a liability incurred for valuable and sufficient consideration or be a covenanted donation to a charity (clause 48 (4) (b));
(k) If the paying company is non-resident, the liability must have been incurred wholly and exclusively for the purposes of a trade it carries on in the United Kingdom;
(l) Where the payment is to a non-resident, the conditions of clause 48 (5) must be complied with.

Taking (a) and (i) together, the company must not only be the payer, it must ultimately bear the payment. Both 'paid' and 'ultimately borne' are familiar income tax conceptions and there is a good deal of case law in the meaning of 'paid' in the context of a taxing Act. The rigours of this law are softened in favour of payments to a bank, stockbrokers, or discount house. Interest is deemed in these cases to be paid when the creditor debits the company in his accounts; thus avoiding the difficulties thrown up by Paton v. C.I.R. (17 A.T.C. 57). This provision brings corporation tax law into line with income tax practice, whatever the strict income tax law may be. The provision appears at the end of clause 48 (3) and in no way modifies the requirement that the interest is to be 'ultimately borne' by the company.

The ban on payments made before April 6th, 1966, calls for explanation, bearing in mind that the accounting period could fall wholly before that date. The explanation lies in the fact that income tax and corporation tax will overlap in the period prior to April 6th, 1966. If a company pays retainable charges in 1965–66 it will be able to deduct the old income tax at 8*s* 3*d* in the £. If it has taxed income to cover the charge, it can pocket the tax deducted (Income Tax Act, 1952, section 169). If not, it will have to account for the deducted income tax to the Inland Revenue (ibid. section 170). If the company pays bank interest before April 6th, 1966, in circumstances in which it is not a deductible trading expense, then that bank interest will be available for 1965–66 income tax relief under section 200 of the Income Tax Act, 1952.

The basic definition of 'charges on income' in clause 48 (3) comprises the following:

(a) (i) any yearly interest;
(ii) any annuity;
(iii) any other 'annual payment';

(iv) any royalty or other sum paid in respect of the user of a patent;
(v) mining rents and royalties within section 180 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1952;
(vi) payments for easements enjoyed in the United Kingdom in connection with electric, telegraphic or telephonic wires within section 180 (2), and not being rents within Case VIII of Schedule D.

(b) any other interest (whether yearly or not) payable
(i) in the United Kingdom;
(ii) on an advance from
(1) a bank carrying on a bona fide banking business in the United Kingdom; or
(2) a person who in the opinion of the Inland Revenue is bona fide carrying on business as a member of a stock exchange in the United Kingdom; or
(3) a person who in the Revenue's opinion is bona fide carrying on the business of a discount house in the United Kingdom.

The (a) categories of charges are familiar enough and come straight from section 169 of the Income Tax Act, 1952. The (b) categories of charges are hardly less familiar and come straight from section 200. The draftsman has preserved the quaint distinction between banks and others. With banks it is the banking business which has to be bona fide, no matter how much bad faith goes into the carrying on. How a bank could be a bank at all without carrying on banking is not explained. With persons carrying on stockbroking or discounting, it is the carrying on of the business, not the business itself, which has to be bona fide. There seems to be no practical significance in the distinction; it simply means that the draftsman had mechanically carried into the Bill the complete wording in the 1952 Act, with all its imperfections on its head. So much for reform.

The twin requirements that the payment must be made 'out of the company's profits brought into charge to corporation tax' (clause 48 (1)) and that it must not be deductible in computing the profits (clause 48 (2)) seem to be an unnecessary elaboration. If the payment is deductible, it cannot at the same time be paid 'out of' the profits (cf. Moss Empires Ltd v. C.I.R. (16 A.T.C. 178). The ban on deductibility must be read in a special sense, since the whole object of clause 48 is to make the payment 'deductible against' the profits, in computing, not the profits, but the corporation tax on them.

What clause 48 (2) has in mind principally are the provisions in clause 50 (3) which permit the deduction of certain charges in computing income.

As to the ban on deducting 'dividends or other distributions of the company', it is difficult to imagine how a 'dividend' could in any case fall within the basic definition of charges on income. However, the word 'distribution' is another matter because it is the subject of a specially wide definition in Schedule 10. This definition includes 'dividend', which is another reason why that word is surplus in clause 48 (2). Schedule 10 is divided into two parts. Part I applies generally and does not appear to overlap the basic definition of charges on income. Part II, comprised in paragraph 9 and confined to 'close companies', brings in as 'distributions' a number of payments which would otherwise be charges on income. It is this provision which has called forth so much criticism, particularly when it is borne in mind that the field of close companies is even wider than the already wide field of companies formerly potentially liable to surtax direction. The number of companies which are not close companies must be a very small minority indeed. We hope to deal with the meaning of 'distribution' in a subsequent article.

The ban on deducting payments which are 'charged to capital' was presumably enacted with an eye on the line of cases ending with Chancery Lane Safe Deposit & Offices Co Ltd v. C.I.R. (43 A.T.C. 111). 'Covenanted donation to a charity' means a payment under a disposition or covenant made by the company in favour of a body of persons or trust established for charitable purposes only, whereby the like annual payments (of which the donation is one) become payable for a period which may exceed six years. The covenant etc. must not be capable of earlier termination under a power exercisable without the consent of the payee.

Payments falling under (a) of the basic definition which are made to a non-resident person are subject to a further restriction imposed by clause 48 (5), which sub-clause the Government is to amend.

Business Simulation— Dynamic Tool or Enjoyable Pastime?

by R. IAN TRICKER, A.C.A., F.C.W.A.

SIMULATION is concerned with models that represent reality. The flight-trainer reproduces the effects of a plane in the air, without the associated dangers of reality, and the trainee pilot learns under the conditions simulated by the model. The bridge builder makes a model of his proposed structure and simulates possible forces on it. On this he can test his plans and replan as necessary.

The model is not reality but a representation of it in a particular form, produced for a purpose. A plan of a factory floor showing machine areas is a model in two dimensions produced for allocating space. A company balance sheet is a model of the company's resources prepared in a specific way for a purpose. It is not the company but one way of looking at it. A set of mathematical equations which precisely define the parameters applicable to the allocation of resources is a model which enables alternative courses of action to be chosen. A product standard cost is a model of various factors making up that product under specified conditions, looked at in a precise way.

Simulation is the business of using the models to learn something about their behaviour under certain conditions, and hence about the real thing.

Business Games

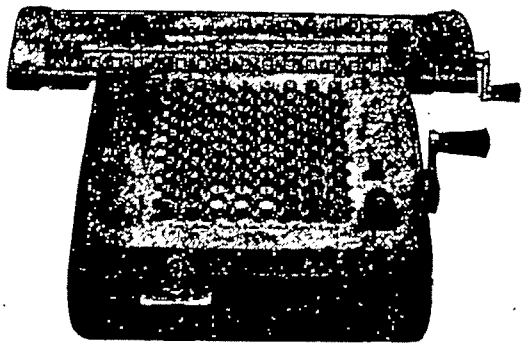
The most widely recognized simulation in the business world at the present time is popularly called the 'business game'. When used as an aid in management training, this is a model of the company in its environment which reacts sufficiently realistically and dynamically for various points to be recognized. Business games will never turn accountants into managers. But involvement in a simulated business situation can help to improve skills and change attitudes. The purpose of this article is to question whether the existing methods achieve what is claimed, and to suggest that there are opportunities for the accountancy profession in business simulation which are not being realized.

So far we have adopted the popular term 'game', but there is a valuable semantic distinction drawn by Pugh[1] between 'game' and 'exercise'. He suggests that 'game' should refer only to the use of mathematical models which seek to simulate reality under competitive conditions and which are used to predict probable outcomes under various inputs. These models, like life, are highly complex and the theory of games which supports them highly mathematical. Their use lies in the planning process, not in training.

The word 'exercise', Pugh argues, should be applied to those simulations used for training purposes. Here, the aim is quite different from that of the game. Using this terminology, it is the 'business exercise' that has caught the popular imagination.

Various groups of accountants have experienced these exercises during the last two or three years. The first on record was held in April 1962 by the London and District Society of Chartered Accountants. In November 1963 this Society also held a marketing-orientated dynamic exercise in which six groups each managed a company competing for sales of a single product in three areas, varying price, advertising and sales staff. In both cases a computer was used to calculate the interactions and to feed back trading results to the participants.

More recently, in March this year, the London and District Society of Certified Accountants engaged in a business management exercise; and in May the Birmingham and Liverpool Societies of Chartered Accountants held a similar joint venture. Again a computer was used in these exercises.



Advantages Claimed

The claim that is usually made for these exercises is the learning benefit of working with a realistic model, under dynamic conditions, without the inherent dangers of reality. The advantages, it is suggested, include[2]:

(a) overcoming myopic specialism tendencies;

(b) ability to see the firm as a whole;
(c) improvement of communicating and co-ordinating skills;
(d) opportunity to study the decision making process and the effects of a series of decisions;
(e) opportunity to study supply and demand factors in pricing policies;
(f) appreciation of the effect of volume and mix fluctuations on cost behaviour;
(g) demonstration of need for information, appropriately presented;
(h) opportunity to link the business situation with formal academic studies.

The introduction of the computer enables complexities and random influences to be built into the model to improve its realism. No-one would suggest that the game represented reality. Judgements about the market behaviour under certain pressures, on the penalties for undue delivery delays, unacceptable prices and stocking policies have all to be built initially into the programme. The danger lies in the assumption that what appears realistic is behaving the same as reality.

One participant, eulogizing about a particular exercise, commented on the remarkable similarity between the arguments his group had about marketing strategy or production policy and the real thing. Unfortunately, the real thing in his case was management by hunch and emotion. Not the sort of approach to be reinforced by the apparent authority of success when playing this sophisticated exercise.

Realism or Reality

The greater the complexity and randomness built into a computer-controlled game – the greater the realism; but equally, the greater the difficulty of identifying the effect of logical decisions genuinely developed from information available. The trend under the pressures of the dynamic exercise is to revert to management by slogan – 'advertising always pays off'; 'the more salesmen in the field the more profit we make'; 'go for the volume markets – that's where the money is', and so on. In an exercise these approaches may produce a successful result – but if the decisions have been reached by intuition based on 'business acumen' rather than logical deduction based on such information as there is, whilst recognizing the risk elements, what have the participants learnt about scientific management? What has happened is that they have played the exercise, in the belief that it simulates reality. They see validation of their managerial ability in the success as measured by a model which, in fact, is highly imperfect and can react only to those factors considered important by the designer.

Possible Uses

The question we ought to be asking is what are we setting out to achieve from the use of simulation methods? It is suggested that there are a number of areas in which a study of simulation would advance the profession of accountancy, these include:

(a) the planning of company strategy;
(b) the internal planning of a company;
(c) the development of post-qualification accountants; the training of articled clerks;
(d) research into management needs and use of accounting information.

Strategic Planning

If the accountant is to justify his reputation for assisting top management in policy-making decisions, determining the course the company is to take in relation to the environmental conditions – he must be prepared to consider all ideas which might enable him to fulfil this function better.

Some companies are currently putting a lot of thought into the improvement of the information available for planning. Statistical forecasting techniques are quantifying probabilities which until recently were only 'feelings'. The games theorist has considered the probable outcomes of a nuclear war; there is no reason why he should not consider the effect of a company dropping a bomb on its competitors in terms of a new product. Increasingly the question to which top management requires an answer is, 'What would happen if we did this?' As technological complexities increase and the time taken for the major long-term decision to pay off extends, they cannot afford to take the risks involved without this information. Mathematical simulation is likely to be one solution. As this is a developing method there is a natural hesitancy in believing there can be anything practical in it. The area is certainly one ripe for investigation by accountants in management.

Internal Planning

The concept of profit planning is well known. Based on market forecasts, the plan relates the utilization of available resources to the achievement of corporate objectives. The involvement with budget setting throughout management unifies the whole activity. The resultant plan is a model of the way the company will perform assuming everything behaves exactly as forecast. Everyone knows that this will not happen, but the operation is valuable on two counts:

(1) the model has had to be built – it forced everyone into the vital discipline of examining and quantifying their operation and relating it to the whole. It has identified the need for improvement;

(2) the model is available against which to measure the actual. Management by exception is possible.

In a specific set of conditions, however, fluctuations in the level of activity caused by changes in order volume or mix, cause the actual to be not only of a different size to the model, but of a different shape – useful comparison then becomes impossible without another model.

Flexible budgeting has found little favour because of the work involved in frequently constructing models. The computer can help to overcome this particular hurdle. This area has a major potential for improving the service the accountant offers management in planning and control. This could lead beyond decisions that work, to decisions that optimize.

Post-qualification Development

We have already considered the possible dangers of simulation for training purposes. Yet the 'business exercise' is still a good tool because of the involvement it encourages under dynamic conditions. If the difficulties are recognized and the exercises designed to illustrate formal ideas and test specific factors, they can be successfully used in a training programme, bringing desirable attitudinal change and improved skills.

The young accountant in industry tends to be involved in fact collecting and processing systems involving masses of data. Another aspect of the business exercise is the opportunity it gives for studying the next level of systems which involve people. The insight into the behaviour of human beings and the effect of oneself on others, is amplified in the dynamic situation and is a significant factor in operating at the same level in reality.

It would be very useful if suitable exercises could be prepared to support a formal development programme for the post-qualification Management Information Certificate.

Training

Simulation in the training of articled clerks has hardly been explored. The role-playing type of simulation has been tried by some students' societies in mock income tax appeals and interviews. This area might reward further study in furthering the trainee's knowledge of human relationship and his own ability to express his views.

The dynamic exercise would seem to promise great advantages. If one was designed to emphasize the essential internal information links in a business so that the participants could recognize the hierarchy of systems, to study the relationships between functions, and to examine how resources are balanced against a plan, an appreciation of the way a business runs could be obtained which currently takes years of experience to discover.

Inevitably the young student's views of business operation is restricted. Participation in a simulation orientated towards system study could identify the inputs and outputs and establish the unity in a business operation, thereby giving an objective rather than myopic outlook. Students would at last be produced who did not believe that a business should revolve round the books of account.

This is an area in which the professional bodies might commission some work.

Research

The accountant deals in information for management. The accountancy profession has recognized this in the institution of the Diploma in Management Accounting Services. So far the emphasis in accountancy has been on the production of data for management. The next step is to discover what information managers need and how they use it – rather than what they think they need and how the accountant thinks they should be using it.

The evolving information technology is showing that there is much more involved in getting information over to somebody than merely transmitting it. What is received is distorted by other messages, the receiver is biased, some parts of the message are selected for amplification, other parts are stifled. The accountant who has tried to bring about managerial action on an issue – shown to be important from the figures – against the managers' wishes, will recognize the situation.

Defining data as all the reportable facts and information as that part of data of value to managers because it leads to action, accountants are currently issuing masses of data unaware of their information content. In the computer era where data volumes can be colossal, this knowledge is essential. Information is costly, but only becomes valuable when it says something that is accurate and new which leads to managerial action.

A series of business simulations, designed for research, in which managers and accountants acted as management teams selecting information for decision making from all the available data, could provide the raw material for important advances in our understanding of the use of accounting information. The simulation has the advantage over investigations of real life as a research tool because the extraneous distortions can be controlled.

Some work has been done by Dyckman in this field at the University of California[1]. He used individuals to act as the management within a simulated business environment to study whether the various alternatives available to the accountant in the presentation of financial data, evolving from identical facts, could have an effect on business decisions.

This way of using business simulations for research could take the accountant forward from being the provider of the data management thinks it needs to stay alive, to becoming a stage in a managerial process which understands the precise information it needs to optimize its opportunities.

Five areas have been suggested in which business simulation can be of service to accountancy. As the rate of technological change accelerates, as the understanding of the management process improves, as the computer-born information era dawns, the challenge to accountancy is to move from historically-orientated record keeping to planning and control-conscious management participation. One tool which promises to be useful in the process of innovation is business simulation.

SOUTH AFRICA

New Finance Charge on Bank Overdrafts

THE South African commercial banks have recently issued an announcement that, with effect from July 1st next, a new system for charging interest on bank overdrafts will be introduced in order to maintain proper control over aggregate lendings and to deter customers from arranging larger overdraft facilities than they actually require.

The system will only apply to overdrafts having arranged limits of R100,000 (£50,000) or more. In such cases, a fee of ⅛ per cent per annum, payable monthly in arrear, will be charged on the amount of the limit from the date on which it is arranged. Interest on amounts drawn will then be charged at a rate ½ per cent below the rate which would normally have been levied on the borrowing. These arrangements will apply similarly to any arranged excesses over a limit.

Where borrowings are taken without arrangement or limits are exceeded without prior arrangement, the interest rate charged will be ½ per cent above the rate normally applicable to the lending.

The finance fee will not be applied on borrowings arranged up to a figure below R100,000 (£50,000) nor on purely temporary borrowings for full permanent repayment within three months but, in the latter case, the charge will be applied retrospectively if the borrowing is not repaid permanently within the three months.

The banks announce that they will not make exceptions to the new arrangements and they will not take over accounts from each other where a customer wishes to change because his banker has applied the finance charge system to his account. The adoption of the new system by the banks is approved by the South African Reserve Bank and it will also be applied by the merchant banks in South Africa.

Public Accountants' and Auditors' Board

THE names of the persons appointed in terms of the Public Accountants and Auditors Act, 1951, as members and alternate members of the Public Accountants' and Auditors' Board for a period of one year with effect from January 1st, 1965, have been announced.

As usual, there have been several changes in the composition of the Board which, in terms of the Act, consists of four persons selected from amongst officials holding certain high-ranking posts in the State service; two persons who are university professors or lecturers in accounting and seven persons nominated by the four provincial societies of accountants, together with one further accountant, with limited powers, nominated by the Rhodesia Society of Accountants.

Mr Hugh Atherstone Smith, of Johannesburg, has been elected as Chairman of the Board for the ensuing year, with Mr Geoffrey Hutchinson Surtees, of Bloemfontein, as Vice-Chairman.

FRANCE

Law of Succession

A RECENT issue of the Bulletin de la Société de Comptabilité de France contained an interesting account by Maître Tancrède Thibaud of the rights of a surviving spouse under the new law of succession passed in July 1963. Prior to that date the principle of French law was to grant succession to the immediate family of the deceased – ascendant or descendant – and in the absence of these to the collateral family – brothers, uncles, nephews, or cousins. The result was that the husband was not the wife's heir, nor the wife the husband's heir, except under a will made specifically in favour of the surviving spouse, and even then difficulties frequently arose with the direct kindred.

The new law has changed this unsatisfactory state of affairs and now a spouse of full age can make a will in favour of the survivor. If he (or she) is a minor of at least 16 years of age, he can only give to the survivor half of his disposable property, and if he wishes her to benefit by the whole amount he must remake his will on attaining his majority. The beneficiary must be the testator's legally married partner. Married persons who made their wills before the coming into force of the new law must remake them in order to comply with it.

The most important point of the new law is the fixing of the share to be given to a spouse by will. If there are several legitimate children the testator has three formulas to choose from:

(1) He can give to his spouse –
  (a) one half of all his property if there is one child;
  (b) one-third of all his property if there are two children;
  (c) one-quarter of all his property if there are three or more children.

(2) One-quarter of all his property and a life interest in three-quarters whatever the number of legitimate children. This is the most generous formula between spouses.

(3) Whatever the number of legitimate children, a life interest in the whole property. This is the most prudent formula. All the income goes to the surviving spouse and the capital is maintained for the children.

If there are children by a former marriage, the testator can only give to his surviving spouse.

(a) a half share in all the property if there is one child;
(b) a third share in all the property if there are two children;
(c) a quarter share in all the property if there are three children or more.

The surviving spouse must prove his right to benefit by the will of his deceased partner by producing his marriage certificate; the death certificate of his spouse; the will (or deed of gift) which must be registered within three months of the death; a declaration drawn up by a notary. He will thus establish his declaration of succession which must be deposited at the registrar's office within nine months of the death.

This new law has important effects on commercial and company practice, e.g. the registration of title, voting at ordinary and extraordinary meetings, transfers of shares, etc.

NEW ZEALAND

Society's New President and Vice-President

MR H. G. WEST, F.P.A.N.Z., a partner in the firm of Griffin, Hodgson, West & Yates, public accountants, of Nelson, is the new President of the New Zealand Society of Accountants.

Since his election to the Council of the Society in 1957, Mr West has served on a number of its committees including the Investigation Committee of which he was chairman during 1963–64. He is currently chairman of the Nelson Hospital board and a director of several companies in the Nelson district. During the war he served in the Pacific with the New Zealand 8th Brigade.

The new Vice-President of the Society is Mr B. F. Anderson, B.COM., F.P.A.N.Z., a partner in the firm of Jameson Son & Anderson, public accountants, of Christchurch.

Elected to the Council of the Society in 1959, Mr Anderson has been a member of several of its committees, and was chairman of the Investigation Committee in 1964–65. He has also been an active member of the committee of the Society's Christchurch Branch serving as its Chairman in 1954.

UNITED STATES

Management Services and the C.P.A.

WRITING in the Journal of Accountancy for March, Mr Robert Beyer, C.P.A., of the American Institute's committee on management services, says it is time some logical guide-lines were set for a common body of knowledge in management services which can be analysed and challenged. The Institute's committee on professional ethics has determined that a practitioner may render management services without loss of independence, provided he does not, at the same time, take part in decision-making. To go further, Mr Beyer thinks, would be dangerous. He stresses the new role of the controller, who was formerly primarily concerned with the accounting system. With today's scientific approach, Mr Beyer says that management, through the controller, must accept major responsibility for quantitative information, which includes the accounting function but is not limited by it. With responsibilities for operations research, electronic data processing, systems analysis, cost accounting, budgeting and profit planning, the controller may rise to untold heights. If he remains merely an accountant he will, over the years, recede to comparative oblivion. Management information today must be concise, hard-hitting and able to stand quantitative analysis. The problem must be regarded from the standpoint of the profession as it will be in twenty-five years.

Generally Accepted Accounting Principles

THE American Institute has just published Accounting Research Study No. 7, Inventory of Generally Accepted Accounting Principles for Business Enterprises, by Mr Paul Grady, C.P.A. The approach has been to start with accounting as it is today and to proceed from the principles which can be taken as generally agreed upon, towards a consensus on problems yet to be resolved. In two earlier studies on basic accounting postulates and broad accounting principles, respectively, the opposite plan of making a fresh start and trying to build an ideal accounting framework was adopted. The new study puts current problems in perspective and indicates the progress already made, while highlighting the main areas of controversy.

The new study is expected to help the Accounting Principles Board of the American Institute in its task of narrowing the differences and inconsistencies in practice and reconsidering old pronouncements.

BRAZIL

The Abacus Society of São Paulo

THE annual report for the year ended March 31st, 1965, of The Abacus Society of São Paulo, presented at the twelfth annual meeting on April 28th, records a total membership of the Society of sixty-four.

Nine meetings were held during the year, the average attendance being twenty-five, and a wide variety of topics were selected for discussion. The Society's annual Christmas party, the twelfth to be held, again proved to be a successful and enjoyable occasion.

In its annual appraisal of the economic situation in Brazil, the report mentions that the past year has seen many changes on the political and economic fronts. Following the revolution on March 31st, 1964, immediate and drastic measures were taken to reduce the rate of inflation for 1964 from an estimated 140 per cent to a staggering, if lesser, 80 per cent. In its efforts to curb inflation at all costs, the new Government has come out with a spate of new legislation which has resulted in increased personal taxation and designed to reduce the amount of money in circulation. These deflationary measures, the report continues, in a country such as Brazil, whose economy has been geared for so long to a high level of inflation, are having some inevitable and well-known recessionary effects.

For the last four years the effect of inflation on financial statements had been the main theme of the Society's annual reports. Last year it was stated that satisfactory accounting treatment would have to be developed if financial statements were to be more meaningful, and the committee's report for 1964 mentions that as a result of recent legislation it is pleasing to note that in Brazil at least some progress has been made in this field:

(a) Companies are now obliged to revalue their fixed assets annually and correspondingly write up the cruzeiro equivalent of their loans in foreign currency (if understated) and–or increase their capital.

(b) Some depreciation on buildings and on revaluation increments is now admissible for tax purposes.

(c) Through tax incentives companies are now encouraged to create a reserve for the erosion of working capital.

(d) More realistic depreciation rates are to be accepted by the tax authorities.

Although the Government has made a creditable effort to give official recognition to inflation, the report states that some of the measures introduced are but half-measures and other problems of fair presentation remain in the lap of the accountant to resolve. The report concludes by declaring that it is in such a period of economic readjustment that accountants, whether in practice or in industry, have a unique opportunity of showing their mettle. 'A more positive and realistic approach is required. Historical or stewardship accounting simply will not do in the present circumstances.' Whether accounts are destined to be produced to banks, shareholders or overseas management, a great deal more information is required if the trader is expected to be able to assess the true financial position of the company.

President: Mr P. C. G. de Kersaint Giraudeau, A.C.A.

Vice-President: Mr R. McDonnell, A.C.A.

Hon. Secretary: Mr G. H. Osborn, M.B.E., A.A.C.C.A., Caixa Postal 8149, São Paulo, Brazil.

Hon. Treasurer: Mr C. J. Cross, F.C.A.

Members: Messrs R. G. Rogers, F.C.A., and H. Nixon, A.A.C.C.A.

MUNICIPAL TREASURERS' CONFERENCE

LOCAL government is now spending about 10 per cent of the gross national product, or £2,800 million a year, and has become one of the fastest growing sectors of the economy with an expenditure increase of about 8 per cent per annum over the last few years.

Some 1,600 of the people responsible for handling this vast expenditure have been attending the eightieth annual conference of The Institute of Municipal Treasurers and Accountants at Eastbourne this week. They are the chairmen of local government finance committees together with members of the Institute, many of whom are treasurers of local authorities, and they have been discussing a number of the major financial and administrative problems facing local government at the present time. Yesterday (Friday) Mr Herbert Keeling, F.I.M.T.A., Borough Treasurer of Worthing, was installed as President of the Institute for the ensuing year. The conference will be fully reported in The Accountant next week.

SCOTTISH INSTITUTE'S SUMMER SCHOOL

THE thirteenth Summer School of The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland opens next Friday evening at the University of St Andrews and will continue until the following Monday evening. Some one hundred and twenty members of the Institute will be attending.

After dinner in Hall on the first evening, the President of the Institute, Mr Robert Browning, C.B.E., M.A., LL.B., C.A., will welcome members to the course. An address will then be given on 'British management and leadership' by Mr D. L. Nicolson, B.SC., A.C.G.I., M.I.(MECH.)E., M.I.P.E., M.I.R.N.A., followed by the first meeting of the discussion groups.

On Saturday, Mr C. I. R. Hutton, B.A., C.A., will introduce his paper, previously circulated, on 'Sources of business credit and financial reporting to obtain it', and there will then be group discussion. The afternoon will be free when members will have the opportunity of taking part in a golf competition or a car treasure hunt.

After morning service in the Collegiate Church of St Salvator on Sunday, questions will be submitted by the discussion groups to Mr Hutton. Later, Mr Angus F. Murray, M.A., F.I.A., will introduce his paper on 'What investors want from company accounts' and in the evening the discussion groups will meet to discuss the paper.

On Monday morning, following questions to Mr Murray by the discussion groups, Mr Ronald Peddie, B.A., C.A., J.P., will introduce his paper on 'The assessment of profitability'. The groups will later meet for discussion and subsequently put questions to Mr Peddie. The course will conclude with dinner in Hall on Monday evening when a number of guests will be present.

This year, a greater proportion of the available time will be devoted to group discussions and the contributors will visit the groups when their papers are being considered. In addition, the President and Vice-President of the Institute will meet each group and give them an opportunity to raise any matters affecting the Institute's welfare.

INSTITUTE'S NEW DISTRICT SOCIETIES

AS announced in the report of the June Council meeting of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales elsewhere in this issue, two new district societies of the Institute have been formed bringing the total to sixteen. The new societies are the Southern Society of Chartered Accountants (formerly part of the South Eastern Society) and the North West Society of Chartered Accountants (formerly the North Lancashire Branch of the Manchester Society).

The decision to split the South Eastern Society has been taken because of the great distance between the western and eastern extremities of the Society's area. The new Southern Society will include the whole of the county of Dorset and rather more than hitherto of south Wiltshire. The Isle of Wight, Hampshire and a small portion of west Sussex bounded by the A286 complete its area. The South Eastern Society will retain the rest of Sussex, and the greater part of the county of Kent. By arrangement with the London and District Society it will extend its area to cover more of west Kent and the southern part of Surrey.

As one of the largest branches of a district society, the North Lancashire Branch of the Manchester Society has for some years made a vigorous contribution to Institute affairs. Although the headquarters town is usually regarded as Preston, the area contains many other urban centres. To meet the needs of members, regular luncheon meetings are held by seven sub-branches based on Blackburn, Blackpool, Burnley, Fleetwood, Kendal, Lancaster and Morecambe, and Preston and Chorley.

The new North West Society extends from Chorley in the south to Penrith in the north. It includes the county of Westmorland to the west of the railway line from Penrith to Sedbergh and the county of Lancashire to the north of a line which loops south from the Ribble estuary to include Chorley and then north-east to the county boundary including Darwen, Accrington, Burnley, Nelson and Colne. The Society will also serve Barnoldswick in Yorkshire.

SETTLORS TAXED ON OVERDRAFTS

THE Court of Appeal has allowed the Inland Revenue appeal against the decision of Mr Justice Plowman in C.I.R. v. Bates (43 A.T.C. 179) on the construction of sections 408 and 411 of the Income Tax Act, 1952. Section 408 imposes tax on a settlor where inter alia he borrows money from a company 'connected with the settlement' and income of the settlement is accumulated in any way. Mr Geoffrey Bates and Mr Ernest Bates were directors and shareholders of a company potentially liable to surtax direction. In 1948 they each made a settlement of shares in the company for the benefit of their children, the income to be accumulated for each child until he attained the age of 22.

Each settlor had a current account on which he could overdraw considerably. From 1959, shortly after April 5th each year, each settlor overdrew some £8,000 to £10,000 and paid it back shortly before the following April 5th. With the agreement of the Special Commissioners the company paid certain dividends and received clearance from surtax direction. The Revenue claimed tax under section 408 on the overdrafts, notwithstanding that they were repaid in the same tax year.

The Court held that the company was 'connected with the settlement' in each case, and that the overdraft was a 'capital sum' within section 408. The calculation of section 408 liability should start from 1937–38 or from the beginning of the settlement if later. The settlor was chargeable up to the total of the capital sums received in all the years from the beginning, restricted to the amount of the income of the settlement which was not distributed. The Court granted leave to appeal to the House of Lords, according to The Guardian of June 3rd.

UNIT AND INVESTMENT TRUSTS: CAPITAL GAINS TAX

CLAUSE 34 of the Finance Bill gives limited relief to unit trust holders and to shareholders of closely defined investment trusts in respect of double taxation on capital gains. On May 22nd we referred to criticisms of clause 34 by the Association of Investment Trusts. The case for both kinds of investors has been vigorously pressed in the House of Commons. On May 31st, Mr Diamond, the Chief Secretary, promised some amelioration on the report stage of the Bill, but only in the case of unit trusts. Moreover, the concession does not seem to go very far. The Chief Secretary said:

> '. . . unit trusts will pay capital gains tax on changes of investment on the assumption that their units remain constant in number, but if the units are falling – that is to say, if individuals had been paid back – that amount will be deducted from the figure on which the capital gains tax is assessed, so that the trust will be assessed only on the capital gains made in respect of a continuing number of unit holders, and the unit holders who have been sold out, who have left, who have been repaid, will be assessed individually on any capital gains they have made. As a result there will be a fairly simple assessment on the unit trusts in respect of their switching, and the Inland Revenue will have to seek out each individual holder who has been repaid during the period and collect from him individually the capital gains tax which will not have been paid by the trust.'

Dinner party at the Savoy Hotel. The partners of Robson, Morrow & Co entertained to dinner at the Savoy Hotel, London, on May 26th, the Presidents of the three Institutes of Chartered Accountants, Mr W. Guy Densem (England and Wales), Mr Robert Browning (Scotland), and Dr Howard Robinson (Ireland), with whom they are associated in practice. Two Past Presidents, Mr R. P. Winter (England and Wales) and Mr J. W. Dallachy (Scotland), with whom they are also associated were present, together with partners from associated firms in London, Scotland, Ireland, Merseyside, the West of England and India.

He added that this compromise had been put forward on behalf of unit trusts.

On June 3rd, the Wider Share Ownership Council put out a statement claiming that the concessions so far announced did not go far enough, and did not bear out the Financial Secretary's statement that the Government were anxious to encourage small investors. Investors in unit and investment trusts would still pay a higher rate of capital gains tax than if they invested direct. The concession was technical and did nothing to remove this. Investment trust company shareholders had been excluded even from the concession. The Council still argues that unit trusts and investment trusts should be exempt from capital gains tax; leaving the individual holders to pay on their realizations. Moreover, there should be an exemption limit, and also tapering provisions.

THE directors were complacently pleased with themselves when we established our helpful scheme for subsidizing the efforts of junior staff in the accounts department to improve their knowledge by studying for professional qualifications. As I chronicled last week, subject only to achieving successful examination results, we offered to reimburse the employee's outlay, including costs of courses, students' registration fees, textbooks, etc. It seemed generous. In my own early days such munificence was unknown. Past generations of toilers never dreamed of the possibility of financial assistance in their studies; nowadays we lean backwards to ease the load on ambitious juniors.

Staff reaction, however, was less appreciative than I had anticipated. It seemed curiously sceptical. Admittedly those few determined strivers who had ab initio been dedicated to self-improvement were touchingly grateful, but other possible candidates sniffed suspiciously like watchdogs at an unfamiliar postman. What are you trying to put over on us? their eyes asked. Take Tishy, for example.

At the ripe age of 24, Tishy is a cost clerk whose reading has scarcely stretched beyond newspapers and lurid paperbacks. Ten-pin bowling and girls fill his horizon. Crisp of hair and broad of shoulder, cheerful and easygoing, he sat across the desk and asked about his prospects of future advancement – with or without exams. I told him fairly that without some accounting expertise he couldn't hope to progress further up the ladder. There would be two good promotional vacancies in our department next year, I encouraged him, resulting from retirement of senior staff. Now was his chance. If he wanted to be considered, he'd need to do more with his young life than just enjoy himself; as a bachelor he had plenty of free time in the long summer evenings; let him plan a positive programme ahead. I nearly quoted Robert Browning's Grammarian's Funeral:

'Others mistrust and say: "But time escapes; Live now or never?"
He said; "What's time? Leave Now for dogs and apes!
Man has Forever" '.

Sowing that he might reap, didn't register with Tishy. He wanted things arranged nicely in advance. 'I might fail,' he brooded. 'Wasting all those months. I'm champion of our bowling team now and they need all the help I can give in the league.' True, he wouldn't qualify for the subsidy if he didn't pass his exam., I agreed, but he'd have compensations. He'd be eligible for a better paid job. After all, most juniors studied as an optimistic investment for an unknown future; here was his opportunity to be an odds-on bet for a definite vacancy next year.

'Can you promise me either one or the other job if I've made good progress with exams by this time next year?' he queried bluntly. Nothing doing, was the equally blunt answer. Decision would be made in the light of current circumstances; it would be a matter of balancing staff re-deployment and rotation at various levels; he could only take his chance. 'Way I see it,' he demurred, 'the company should promise bang-on promotion to any of us who sweat to pass exams. Come to think of it, some businesses pay lump-sum bonuses right away. After all, we're really doing it for the company's good, rather than our own. It's to buck up efficiency and public image and all that.'

It seemed pointless to talk about a spoon-fed generation of demoralized softies, but before I could speak he put me in my place. 'Thanks a lot,' he said warmly, 'but not to worry. Our team captain sells motor-cars; he's been pressing me to take a salesman's job with him any time I want it, so accounting is just a waste of time.'

It's bad enough trying to spoon-feed him for his own sake, but it's infuriating to learn that he thinks himself too good for the spoon.

Reviews

The Accountant, the Taxpayer and the Revenue

Third Edition, edited by JACK H. HAMES, M.A., LL.B. (The Fiscal Press Ltd, St Albans. 35*s*.)

This is a useful work of reference on the law and practice relating to back duty investigation and the penalties arising in cases of fraud, negligence and neglect; there is an excellent chapter setting out a typical back duty computation of means and expenses.

The conduct of appeals is discussed in a practical way, and there is guidance on the retention of accountants' records. The book provides an excellent summary of the whole relationship of the taxpayer and his adviser with the Inland Revenue, and therefore is good reading for the student.

It is for the practitioner, however, that the book is mainly intended and undoubtedly may be regarded as a good addition to his bookshelf. It contains the relevant portions of statements issued by The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales for the guidance of members on tax frauds, and all in all is a handy and compact guide to its subject.

Financial Accounting Theory - Issues and Controversies

edited by STEPHEN A. ZEFF, PH.D., and THOMAS F. KELLER, PH.D., C.P.A. (McGraw-Hill Publishing Co Ltd, Maidenhead, Berks. 60*s* net.)

This volume is a strong contender for the bookshelves of those accountants who are as concerned with the intellectual background of their profession as they are with the instinctive reflexes of their daily routine.

The joint editors are both associate professors of accounting at business schools attached to American universities, and their academic environment has appropriately conditioned their approach to the task of assembling the collection of essays on current accounting controversies which go to make up this book.

In their introduction the authors make it clear that they have produced this work primarily as supplementary reading for accounting students and undergraduates at an intermediate level, but this should not deter the already-qualified accountant from treating it as an invaluable source of 'refresher' material for bringing himself up to date with trends of thought in the profession.

The editorial concept bears close resemblance to the collection of accounting essays re-edited several years ago in this country by Professor W. T. Baxter and Professor S. Davidson and published under the title Studies in Accounting Theory. The individual contributions, each a classic of its kind, have been appropriately grouped under headings such as income determination, goodwill, nature of liabilities, etc. Because of its American parentage, it is perhaps natural that the emphasis should be on contributions from authors from the other side of the Atlantic, but this reviewer noted with a tinge of regret that only two of them came from United Kingdom accountants – one of those, Professor Baxter, being a Scot, and the other, the late George S. May, was adopted by American accountants as one of themselves many, many years ago.

The arguments in these essays range across the accounting scene in a good-natured and immensely readable style, touching as they go on many of the problems that currently occupy the minds of members of the profession in this country. Those who like their controversy in small doses should not be deterred by the amount they will find in this book – it is ideally designed with the 'browser' in mind.

Society and Management

by STANLEY HYMAN, PH.D. (Business Publications Ltd, London. 45*s*.)

Mr Hyman has taken as his theme the inter-relationship between society and management. His method is discursive and academic, and it is necessary at times to refer to the list of contents to keep on course. At the start, he describes in detail some experimental work for which he has been responsible as senior lecturer in the Kingston College of Technology inter-management attitudes. He describes first a small series of management interviews – pathetically small because of the lack of interest in the project displayed by businesses in the Kingston area – from which the study of the relationship of management and society began. Thus the first part of the book establishes the definitions of management upon which the study is to be based.

Once the scene has been set, Mr Hyman ranges widely over aspects of national and international society which either does or should touch upon the practice of management. This gives the author the opportunity of passing comments on the accounting profession, management consultants, the profit motive, the banking world, etc. The comments are often highly critical and not always well-reasoned. But this does not seriously detract from the value of the book which seeks to re-examine present-day society and its relevance to a technological age. Clearly Mr Hyman does not hope to make a successful challenge on, for instance, the taxation structure of western countries by querying the appropriateness of the present complicated public and private collecting and avoiding organs; but it is refreshing to read a book which attempts to open the study of management and society without preconceived ideas about either.

This is one of a spate of books aiming at the development of a science of management which can then be effectively taught. Its discursive nature will compel students to range in their thoughts far beyond the narrow subject of management. This must be achieved if management studies are to earn a proper place in university curricula in Britain. And what Mr Hyman is really seeking to do is make his readers think broadly about the content of management, rather than to teach them anything. His book deserves to be read widely, and not least by accountants, since his recorded views of criticisms made by management about accountants are probably valid, and could be out-dated by more accountants spending more time and effort studying the relationship of accounting and society and thus of accounting and management. At the same time accountants who read the book must resolve not to be irritated when Mr Hyman says, for instance, that very few accountants are qualified in management accounting – a view which is surely quite difficult to substantiate in 1965.

Finance and Commerce

Austin Reed

THE accounts of Austin Reed Ltd are presented in a changed form this year. Mr Douglas A. Reed, chairman of the company, commenting on the new presentation, describes it as a 'more simplified form' which the company feels 'is in line with modern practice and is designed to present the salient features of the accounts as concisely as possible, whilst retaining in the notes – which are much fuller than usual – the detail information required by the professional investor'.

Additional information is provided in a schedule of group statistics covering the past ten years and graphs showing the retail turnover and retail expenses over the same period. The old form of the Austin Reed accounts was 'double sided' with separate parent and group accounts, and the notes were restricted to dividend, capital profit and capital reserve details.

The new form, as the reprint shows, gives group and parent figures and comparison to the right of a single narrative. The figures are on the left-hand page of a double quarto opening itself extended by a fold-out page of notes. As has been said in the past, group parent and comparative figures to one narrative is not easily accomplished and the Austin Reed combined balance sheet has a cramped look about it. Nevertheless, presentation and content is a considerable improvement on the old form.

Profit Figures Lost

The feature of the Austin Reed accounts, however, is the combination of directors' report and profit and loss account which has the effect of 'losing' the profit figures. This is not a new development for the company but the changed presentation is not an improvement. In the previous accounts, although the directors' report was stated as 'incorporating the profit and loss appropriation account', there was on the opposite page a consolidated profit and loss account proper. The new form of directors' report incorporating the profit and loss account as well as the appropriation account seems, if the phrase is pardonable, 'a bit of a mess'. The notes are far more conspicuous in the original than the profit figures themselves.

The ten-year record which is new to the accounts this year, analyses the profits before and after tax and shows ordinary capital earnings and dividend cover and also a figure for 'retentions'. The balance sheet analysis reconciles funds employed with total net assets.

Graphs of retail turnover and retail expenses show percentage increases between 1956 and 1965, with turnover showing a 75 per cent rise and expenses an 87 per cent rise over the period, but no actual turnover figure is provided. For the second year running, however, the increase in retail turnover last year was at a higher rate than the increase in expenses. Turnover for 1964–65 was up 6·4 per cent but expenses only rose by 4·8 per cent.

Stock Control

In the last two years the increase in suit and clothing business has been mainly responsible for the rise in turnover. But this has brought a problem in that some branches were getting too small for the company's requirements. There have been branch extensions at a number of places for this reason.

Stock arrangements have been streamlined by bringing more stock nearer to the centre of London thereby making speedier deliveries to the branches. Mr Reed says there is scope for further progress along these lines and the company intends to open a greatly enlarged central warehouse 'in the fairly near future'. In addition, but using new and improved buying methods, customers are being offered a far bigger selection despite less capital tied up in stocks.

On stocks and stock accounting, a new method of stock control in the branches was adopted towards the end of the year. Instead of keeping at head office an itemized financial account of stock at each branch, the work is being decentralized by giving each branch manager the responsibility of keeping unit records of his own stock. These records are checked against a physical stock count which is made at regular intervals. Mr Reed says: 'We are already finding that this method provides more direct information and saves much time in tracing discrepancies'.

CITY NOTES

BANK rate reduction and tighter credit conditions have injected a new combination into stock-market calculations. The increase in hire-purchase down-payments re-emphasized the point that credit, although cheaper, will not be freer.

In stock-market terms, therefore, the combination has improved the gilt-edged market but has not helped equities. The common theme in company reports is the buoyancy of business in the first half of the year, albeit under conditions of pressure on profit margins, but of doubts about business conditions later this year and early next.

If the pressure on credit is to be maintained at its present level until next spring – as indicated in the Governor of the Bank of England's directive – then industrial production may do something more than simply ease back a shade from its present level.

In that respect, and taking the effect of corporation tax into account, dividend prospects, particularly prospects of higher industrial company dividends, are not exactly bright. Doubts on that point may continue to keep the equity sections in check.

The possibility exists, however, that if opinion moves strongly towards the anticipation of an autumn General Election, the equity market may tend to be buoyed up even though the facts behind equities would not seem to justify a rally.

* * * *

THE independent line on interest rates taken by some building societies has been made to look a little premature by the Bank rate cut. But it remains to be seen whether the effect of tight funds and heavy demand for credit does in fact bring down interest rates on investments competitive with the building societies. For the time being the Building Societies Association seems most unlikely to recommend any general increase in interest rates but for the sake of attracting funds there may still be some societies inclined to take an independent line. It should not be overlooked that many societies already offer 4 per cent on share investment account and have been doing so for some months.

* * * *

THE provision of industrial finance facilities in the provinces has been taken a stage further this week with the opening in Leeds of Yorkshire Industrial Trust, a new issuing and finance house. The administrative management of the company is controlled by a board of directors of Yorkshire industrialists under the auspices of Birmingham Industrial Trust. A feature of the organization is that the body of independent shareholders includes prominent Yorkshire business and professional men.

* * * *

ALTHOUGH the hard-won concessions on the Finance Bill have not met with entire approval, there is at least City appreciation of the point that the presentation of facts and the reasoned argument of them has belatedly convinced the Government of the industrial and economic harm that would have been done by the Finance Bill in its original form. The concessions have been won by considered, mature pressure, not by the declamations of some bodies whose outcry has been more of an embarrassment than a help in convincing the Government that concessions were essential.

Payment of Remuneration for Broken Periods

SIR, – With reference to Mr F. H. Johnson's letter in your issue of May 29th, the most equitable method of calculating payment for split periods for monthly staff is to calculate the number of 'working' days in a year and make payment on a pro rata basis. Assuming a five-day week, there are 261 working days (including holidays) in 1965, and a man earning £520 p.a. would be paid $\frac{3}{261} \times$ £520 for three days' work, i.e., £5 19*s* 7*d*.

In effect the annual salary has been reduced to a daily rate.

Yours faithfully,

Denton, Lancs. J. RICHARDSON.

The Directors' Warning

SIR, – I was very disappointed and a little disturbed to read in your issue of May 29th, the following paragraph concerning the pamphlet issued by the Institute of Directors:

> 'Many will feel that the Institute of Directors' pamphlet overdraws somewhat the present threat, but it is idle to pretend that it is non-existent'

I feel that this is a very temporizing statement made at a time when all those that understand the implications of taxation should be solidly behind the Institute of Directors in their campaign to stop the extreme sort of taxation legislation that is now appearing for the first time. No thinking person can fail to detect that this is the first instalment of Mr Kaldor's ideas and the next instalment will be even worse. The legislation is clearly directed against the private business and the elimination of such businesses means the virtual elimination of the accountant in practice. It, therefore, seems to me that your journal should take, if possible, as strong a line as the Institute of Directors.

Yours faithfully,

Cardiff. G. F. K. MORGAN.

[Our correspondent will appreciate that a professional journal must of necessity avoid participating in what may be seen by many of its readers to be basically political issues. In giving publicity to the Institute of Directors' pamphlet we drew the attention of our readers to those views and we feel that it is for readers to judge for themselves from the pamphlet how far the Institute's statement warrants the support of the profession. – Editor.]

Mathematical Programming

SIR, – In my article in your issue of June 5th, the sentence in the second column of page 766 ending '. . . are correlated' should read '. . . are highly correlated.'

Yours faithfully,

Double Taxation with No Relief

SIR, – Mr G. Littlechild's letter (May 29th issue) demonstrates effectively the 'iniquity' of the provisions as affecting the liability for 1965–66 and (in many cases) 1964–65.

To appreciate the full extent of the injustice in relation to 'close companies', however, it is necessary to calculate the total taxation liability, as in the following example:

Annual profit of 'A.' Ltd (owned by Mr A., the full-time working director) – year to April 6th – 1962 to 1967	12,500
Less Director's remuneration	8,000
	£4,500

(Assumed (for convenience) that Mr A. also receives £1,000 a year from another appointment, covering personal allowances and reduced rate relief.)

Assessments:	1963–64	1964–65	1965–66	1966–67
Schedule D	4,500	4,500	4,500	—
Schedule E	8,000	8,000	8,000	8,000
Schedule F (60 per cent on £4,500–£3,600)	—	—	—	540
Corporation tax	—	9,000	9,000	9,000
	£12,500	£21,500	£21,500	£17,540
Profits tax	£9,500	—	—	—
Surtax (excluding other income)	£8,000	£8,000	£8,000	£8,540
Tax Payable:	£	£	£	£
Schedule D	1,744	1,744	1,856	—
Schedule E	2,669	2,669	2,841	2,841
Schedule F	—	—	—	222
Profits tax	1,350	—	—	—
Corporation tax	—	3,600	3,600	3,600
Surtax (excluding other income and allowances)	462	462	462	600
	£6,225	£8,475	£8,759	£7,263
Corresponding liability on £12,500 annual profit if Mr A. were sole proprietor:	£	£	£	£
Schedule D	4,327	4,327	4,607	4,607
Surtax	1,875	1,875	1,875	1,875
	£6,202	£6,202	£6,482	£6,482

It seems important that the implications are fully appreciated before it is too late.

Yours faithfully,

Barnstaple, Devon. C. W. TAYLOR.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT

The President: Gentlemen, the first item on the agenda is to elect a President and Vice-President for the ensuing year. I call upon Sir Thomas Robson.

Sir Thomas Robson, M.B.E., M.A., F.C.A.: Mr President, today we come to the end of another stage in the long journey since our profession in England and Wales created the first organizations in 1870, and merged them under the Royal Charter ten years later – we end another presidential year and start a new one.

The Institute is vastly greater than it was when I was first present as a member of its Council to see the election of a President, and the burdens on its President are commensurately greater. We need a man of many qualities to carry those burdens; not only must he be a man of character and decision, able to represent us outside this room and to rule over us here, but he must have the confidence of every member of the Council and their readiness to give him their support.

It falls to me to suggest to you the name of a man who has these qualities and many more. You know him well, for you have seen him in committee and in Council and other Institute activities for many years, not least in this past year when he has served under you, Mr President, as your Vice-President. I propose, therefore, without more ado, that Mr Robert McNeil be elected President of the Institute for 1965–66, and invite you, Mr President, to call upon Mr A. H. Walton to second this proposal.

There is much that I could say about Mr McNeil's qualities and our confidence in him, but I am going to leave all these duties except one to Mr Walton. The exception is to say how glad we shall be that our new President in the year in which he will be submitting the Council's proposals for alterations in the rules of our incorporated accountant members will combine in himself the traditions both of the old Incorporated Society and of our Institute. Membership of both bodies was acquired by him in the hard way for he had to go through both mills. As we all know, he came through them both as the finest grain. I now have the greatest pleasure, Mr President, in asking you to call on Mr Walton.

Mr A. H. Walton, F.C.A.: Mr President, I rise to support the proposal of Sir Thomas Robson that Mr Robert McNeil be elected our next President.

We can confer no higher honour on a colleague than this. A great office establishes over the years its own tradition and heritage; to maintain and pass on that tradition and heritage requires men of rare ability and character. As to ability, no-one here, I am sure, would wish me to recapitulate the highlights of the Vice-President's career told a year ago. May I say merely that early promise which was exemplified as a prizeman of both Institute and Society has been amply fulfilled.

But, behind the office, the man – what of him? Goethe said 'Character develops itself in the stream of life.' To me there is the essence of our Vice-President. His approach to problems manifests so often that he has touched life in widely differing ways leaving an appreciation of the imperative need for the human touch, a realization that decisions when translated into action affect his fellows, leading to a determination that right shall be done in the fullest sense. This talent will be a great asset when he goes forth as our representative, for his contribution will be direct and practical, and yet made with a charm which is disarming in its frankness.

In presiding over us, I am sure he will guide us to right decisions with speed, but without haste, with a sense of humour and with good humour. I recollect that a year ago he made a plea for the grant of wisdom. Beyond doubt it is his.

Mr President, not always in the march of life do opportunity and inclination walk hand in hand, but today in my good fortune they do as I formally second the proposal that Mr Robert McNeil be elected President of the Institute for 1965–66.

The President: Gentlemen, it has now been proposed and seconded that Mr Robert McNeil be elected President of this Institute for the ensuing year. Those in favour? ('All'). Thank you, gentlemen: that is carried unanimously. (Acclamation.)

Mr McNeil was then invested with the badge of office and took his seat in the chair.

Mr R. McNeil, F.C.A.: I am deeply indebted to you, Sir Thomas and to you, Mr Walton, for the things you have thought fit to say about me today. I was particularly touched to hear the reference made to the Society. I feel that it was necessary at some time to have a man with both the qualifications who would complete, if I may use that phrase, the unification of the Society and the Institute. To Mr Walton, I would say that I hope what Manchester thinks today London will still think in twelve months' time. To all members of the Council, I do thank you most sincerely for the honour which you have paid to me and my district society.

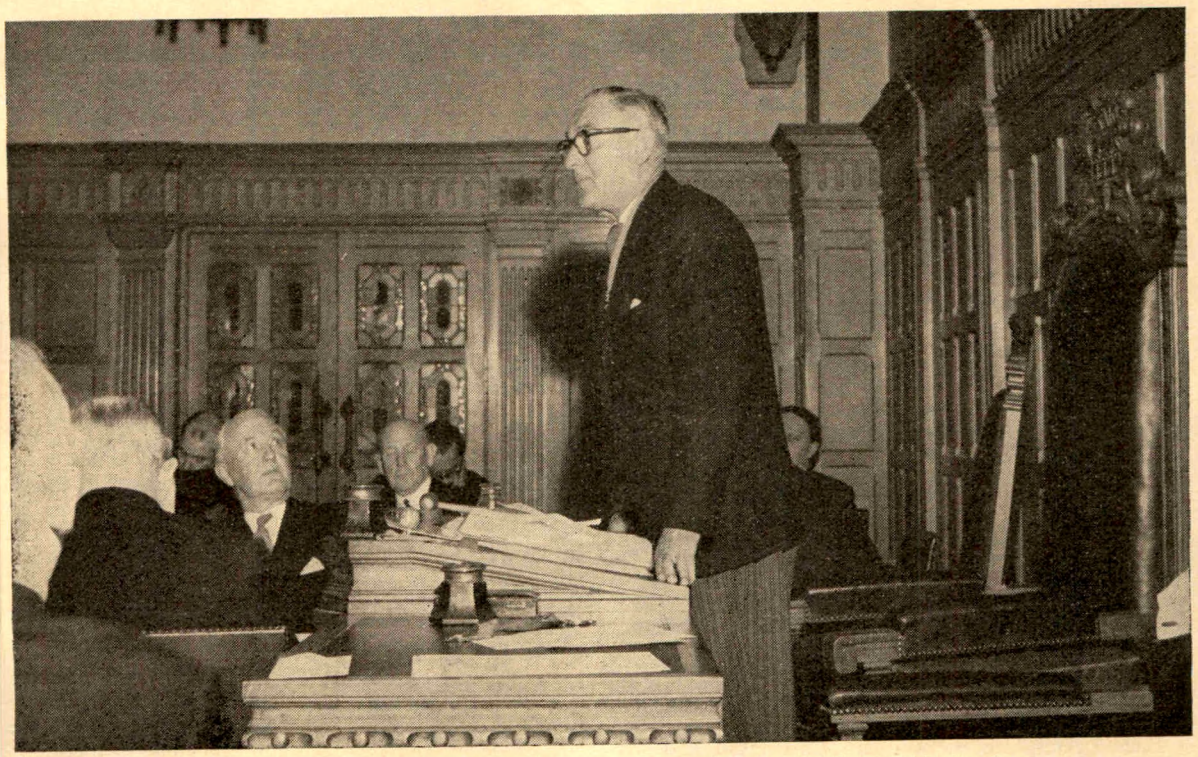
I am particularly glad because I feel that it is an honour that is paid to a man who does not claim to have special talents to offer to this Institute, but he does offer, and I assure you he does, in all full measure, sincerity, integrity, and a burning desire to be of service to this Institute which has meant so much to him and which has been built by the efforts of great men in the past.

In these days of great technological change we, in this Institute, must remain at all times in the forefront. Our training of new entrants and qualified men alike must be geared to the highest possible demands. In our relationships abroad we must maintain our position as leaders of accounting thought and practice, and I am convinced that in the future our entry into the Union Européenne des Experts Comptables Economiques et Financiers will be seen as a statesmanlike decision which has had far-reaching effects on accountancy throughout the world.

There are also other problems nearer home. I feel we must close our ranks. Too often a member who accepts a post in industry or commerce is stated to have left the profession. I want to state quite clearly that in my view he still remains in full membership of this profession and it is indivisible and undivided. I think, with the management techniques which are now in force in the business world, that all these members are able to and will play a large part in the professional life of this country, and I think they will also have a big contribution to make to accounting services in the future.

I feel too that the time is right to get rid of the statement that once a man has left the practising side of the profession it is virtually impossible for him to get back. I think, with the improvement in accounting services, that there will now be a two-way flow into industry and from industry, and it will be to the advantage of the profession as a whole to encourage this flow.

I must, of course, say a word or two about the immediate Past President, Mr Densem. Never was a deputy more fortunate than I in his leader. I started a year ago with a tremendous admiration for him. I still have that admiration, but his kindness, consideration and charm to me have been absolutely outstanding and I have now added to the feeling I had originally, an abiding affection for a really great man.



The tasks which lie ahead are obviously great. I must not, and with your help, I shall not fail.

ELECTION OF VICE-PRESIDENT

The President: The next business, gentlemen, is to elect a Vice-President. I call upon Sir William Carrington.

Sir William Carrington, F.C.A.: Mr President, may I be the first to congratulate you from the floor of the house, which I do most heartily and most sincerely.

Mr President and gentlemen, from time to time, but not very frequently, there arises in the accountancy world a man whose professional knowledge is profound and whose capacity for sifting facts and overcoming apparently impossible situations is such that he achieves fame, first in this Institute and then in a world of affairs as what our American friends call a 'troubleshooter.'

The new President, Mr R. McNeil, F.C.A., addressing the Council following his election.

We have one such in our midst – Henry Benson – and it is his name that I bring before you today as the unanimous choice of the Past Presidents on the active list for nomination to the office of Vice-President.

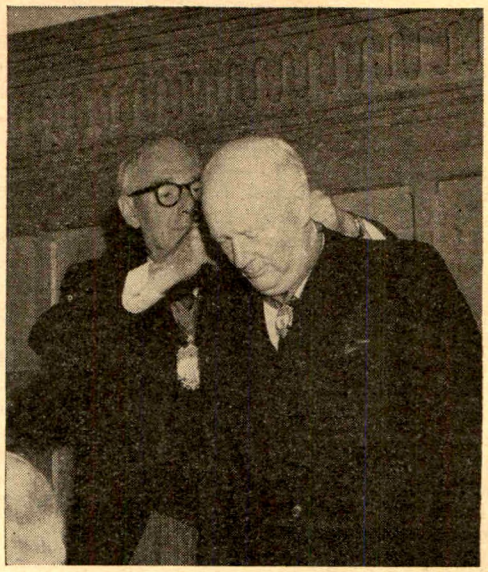
Henry Benson served in the Grenadier Guards in the last war, he was seconded from the Army to the Ministry of Supply in 1943, and from then onwards he rendered immense service to successive Governments at home and abroad in a variety of spheres – housing production, coal utilization, rail transport, the turnround of ships and a committee appointed by the then Chancellor of the Exchequer to see whether taxes could be levied and collected without those who pay noticing them. He was elected to this Council in 1956; he was Chairman of the Parliamentary and Law Committee from June 1959 to June 1962, a vintage period in the production of technical documents, evidence and memoranda in the preparation and presentation of which he played an outstanding part.

Henry Benson's services to the nation and the accountancy profession are indeed manifold and they were most appropriately marked by the award of the C.B.E. in 1946 and a Knighthood in 1964, to the great pleasure of a multitude of friends here and overseas.

As to the man himself – well, he combines intellectual honesty of the highest order with extreme friendliness to his fellow men – perfect traits for high office in this Institute, and so, it is with great pleasure that I now propose that Sir Henry Alexander Benson, C.B.E., F.C.A., be appointed Vice-President for the ensuing year.

Mr G. R. Appleyard, F.C.A.: Mr President, I am delighted as a junior backbencher to have the privilege of seconding the proposal made by Sir William Carrington.

We have all seen Sir Henry at work in various spheres, not only within this Council and its activities, but also in public and Institute affairs. We have come to learn something of the man, and I think that there is no doubt that there is no other member better equipped to undertake the job of representing us as Vice-President of this Institute, particularly in the arduous years that lie ahead.



We have, of course, the greatest confidence, therefore, in the selection of the 'House of Lords' for this appointment, and I can only close by saying that we hope that he will have the best of good fortune in his work and activities, and may he enjoy good health for the tortures that are about to come.

The President: Gentlemen, you have heard the proposal and it has been duly seconded. Is it your wish that Sir Henry Benson be elected as Vice-President? (Acclamation.)

Sir Henry Benson was then invested with the badge of office as Vice-President.

Sir Henry Benson, C.B.E., F.C.A.: Mr President, I would like to be amongst the first members of this Council to congratulate you on being appointed President of the Institute, an office which will be acclaimed throughout the profession.

I am grateful to Sir William Carrington and Mr Appleyard for the picture they have depicted in the last few minutes. It varies a good deal from the man I happen to have lived with for the last fifty years, and I hope that in the months to come I may be able to get the two images a little closer together. As far as the task is concerned, I shall do everything I can to serve the interests of the Institute.

The new Vice-President, Sir Henry Benson, C.B.E., F.C.A., being invested with his badge of office by the President.

VOTE OF THANKS TO RETIRING PRESIDENT

Mr J. C. Montgomery Williams, F.C.A.: Mr President, I am quite sure there is no-one in this room who does not envy me in being entrusted with the task of proposing a vote of thanks to the retiring President, Mr Wilfrid Guy Densem; but, before I proceed with this, I would like to extend to you, sir, and to your Vice-President, my most sincere congratulations on your election to the high offices which you now respectively hold and to offer to you both the very best of good wishes for a happy and successful year.

I used the word task – well, that is quite the wrong word – it is no task, but rather a very valued privilege to be allowed the opportunity of expressing to our immediate Past President the grateful thanks of this Council for the exemplary manner in which he has carried out his manifold duties during the last year. Those duties have indeed been considerable in extent and varied in nature. Guy Densem, gentlemen, has not spared himself in his service to the profession, and it may come as a shock to some of you, as it did to me when I made inquiries, to learn that quite apart from those many duties which are more directly concerned with the affairs of the Institute itself, he has represented us at something like forty outside functions. Nevertheless, knowing him as we do, I think we can be quite sure that in spite of the strain and the responsibility involved, which must have been appreciable, he succeeded in enjoying each and every one of them.

When Sir Thomas Robson was proposing Mr

Densem's election just twelve months ago he said that he hoped he would win the confidence of those who are privileged to sit in this room and of the wider circle of the members of the Institute, of the representatives of other accountancy bodies, and of the governmental authorities and the general public. I am quite certain it is the unanimous verdict of everyone here today that he has done this most fully and completely. In his travels throughout the country – and he has, in fact, attended the dinner of every district society, except that at Nottingham which was to have taken place during the week of mourning which followed the death of Sir Winston Churchill, and therefore had to be cancelled – he has everywhere been received with the greatest enthusiasm and goodwill. In the majority of the districts he met also the members of the Student Societies, and at these meetings as at summer courses, not only last year but for many years past, his undeniable personal charm and his ready willingness to discuss and help to solve the problems of others has rightly earned the greatest respect and gratitude.

Wherever appropriate, and notably on his visit to the fifth U.E.C. Congress in Vienna and the Netherlands, the President was accompanied by Mrs Densem, the lady who I once heard so happily described as being 'both true and fair'. I would like you, Guy, to convey to her our very real appreciation of the most charming and delightful manner in which she has graced these occasions, and also I feel bound to add, to express to her our gratitude for her unselfishness in allowing you to spend so much of your time away from her in furthering the interests of the Institute.

I have confined my remarks to what I might almost term extra-mural activities, and in consequence I have left myself with little time to mention, as I could do with great enthusiasm, Mr Densem's work in the Council Chamber and within the Institute generally. I hope that this omission will be made good by my seconder, but before he has the opportunity of doing so, there is one further aspect to which I must take the liberty of referring.

I would like to offer to you, Guy, my very sincere personal thanks for all the encouragement and assistance which you have given to me as a very raw and inexperienced committee chairman. Whenever I have sought your advice, and indeed on some occasions when I have not dared to do so, you have always been extremely kind and helpful in guiding my steps along the path which I should follow, and believe me, I am more than grateful.

On behalf of this Council, and I am quite sure on behalf of all the members of the Institute, I express to you our heartfelt thanks for your outstanding services to the profession, and I would like you, Mr President, please, to call on Mr Everard Chamberlain to be kind enough to second this proposal.

Mr G. T. E. Chamberlain, F.C.A.: Mr President, gentlemen, it gives me very great pleasure to second the proposal so ably presented by Mr Montgomery Williams that a vote of thanks be accorded to our retiring President. Before doing this, may I, sir, add my congratulations to you and to the Vice-President, on the honour you have received in the election to your respective offices. May I wish you both a very happy and successful period of office.

Today, Mr Guy Densem's name is added to the long list of distinguished members who have given so much of their time and skill to enhance the prestige of our Institute. His services to the profession are far too numerous for me to recite. We in this Council highly value his devotion to his duties – I am informed that he has not missed a committee meeting unless it was quite impossible for him to be present and indeed has not failed to express to those responsible his keen displeasure when two meetings have been called for the same time thus preventing his attendance at one of them. We realize the number of meetings held every year and therefore such an attitude is unusual. In leading our deliberations he has displayed a charm which has been a help to all and encouraged every member to give of his best in the interests of the Institute and its members. I recall today particularly such friendly remarks as 'Is that quite right?' or 'Do we really mean that?' or 'Mr X, would you take it back and have another look at it in the light of what has been said'.

Perhaps I can best sum this up by saying that Mr Densem's conduct of our proceedings has been a true reflection of his recognized ability as a leader and of his most friendly disposition. We are delighted to see him looking so well after the completion of such an arduous task, and we are indebted also to Mrs Densem for the great help she has given him during the past year. I am sure she will be relieved to feel that the ever-ready packed suitcase will no longer be required.

Mr President, it gives me very great pleasure to second the proposal that a vote of thanks be accorded to our retiring President, Mr Guy Densem.

Mr W. G. Densem, F.C.A.: Mr President, Mr Montgomery Williams, Mr Chamberlain, thank you very much indeed for the very kindly and undeserved words you have used and thank you, gentlemen, for the way you received them.

A presidential year is a stimulating experience and undoubtedly a memorable one. The past year has not been spectacular, but it has been extremely busy, because we are living in constantly changing and developing times, and this Institute of ours is one of the moving spirits in the changes in the accounting profession. When I refer to moving I am not thinking that during the last year this Council has met in no less than four different places.

We have been engaged in implementing previously established policies and making a firm base for the expansion of those activities. Nevertheless we have found time amidst all these activities to give quite a lot of attention to forward thinking.

What has struck me most during my year of office has been the extreme friendliness and the kindly spirit of co-operation I have met, not only in this Council – and for that I thank you very much – and its committees, but on my visits to district societies, and on more formal occasions when I have represented the Institute at functions organized by other professional bodies.

I would thank you, gentlemen, for your patience with me over the past year, and I would specially thank Mr Evan-Jones, our Secretary, and the members of the secretariat and the staff for their exemplary patience with me, and their consideration and the great help they have given me. Without that help a President cannot carry out all that falls to his lot. The staff of the secretariat have had an extremely busy year, and without them the Institute's work could not carry on.

Mr President, I very much appreciate the kind words you said about me. I would like to say how very much I valued your support during this past year and on the occasions you had to stand in for me, and I am very grateful; we met often in committee, and I think I would be right in saying that normally when things were troublesome in committee we were thinking along the same lines, and I do wish you a very happy and successful year of office. You did mention, both of you, Mary's help during this past year. Well, she has been quite happy to keep in the background and keep me going and she will be very thankful tonight when she says 'No more of this presidency'. Once again, gentlemen, thank you very much indeed.

It was reported that a memorandum containing the comments of the Council on the provisions of the Finance (No. 2) Bill, 1965, had been sent to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with copies to the Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue, on May 21st, 1965.

It was also reported that a letter had been sent by the President to the Chancellor of the Exchequer on May 13th, 1965, expressing concern over the serious effect which Clause 12 of the Finance (No. 2) Bill would have upon the profession if its effect was to disallow, for surtax purposes, payments by professional firms by way of pension to retired partners or their dependants. Similar concern had been expressed on behalf of other representative bodies. After discussion in the course of debate on the Finance Bill on May 20th, 1965, the Financial Secretary to the Treasury had promised to study the problem further with a view to bringing forward an appropriate amendment on the Report Stage of the Bill.

New Technical Committee

The Council decided to establish a new committee of the Council to be called the Technical Committee. The new committee will take over from the Parliamentary and Law Committee the general responsibility for advice as to technical standards, including the responsibility for preparing statements of technical guidance. The Parliamentary and Law Committee will continue to deal with legislative and similar requirements that affect or impinge on members' technical work.

By dividing these functions between two committees the Council hopes that it will be possible to deal more effectively with the increasing volume of technical demands made on the Institute, both by members and by outside bodies.

Appointments to Committees

The following Committees have been appointed for the year 1965–66:

President ex-officio member of all Committees other than the Disciplinary and Investigation Committees.

H. A. R. J. WILSON, F.C.A.

It was with deep regret that we learned, as this issue went to press, of the death last Wednesday of Mr Hugh Alexander Robert James Wilson, F.C.A., who, until his retirement last August, was a senior partner in Wilson, Bigg & Co, Chartered Accountants, of London. But it will be through his long association with the well-known accountancy coaching firm of H. Foulks Lynch & Co, that the name of 'H. A. R. J.' will be most familiar to many thousands of members of the profession.

A more detailed account of Mr Wilson's life and work will appear in our next issue.

MANCHESTER SOCIETY OF CHARTERED ACCOUNTANTS

New President

At a recent meeting of the committee of the Manchester Society of Chartered Accountants, Mr John A. Edwards, J.P., F.C.A., a partner in the firm of Mellor Snape & Co, Chartered Accountants, of Manchester, was elected President of the Society for 1965–66.

Mr John A. Edwards

He was President of the Manchester Chartered Accountants Students' Society in 1955–56.

A Justice of the Peace for the City of Manchester, Mr Edwards's recreational interests include country life generally, horticulture, and building and handicrafts.

THE NOTTINGHAM SOCIETY OF CHARTERED ACCOUNTANTS

Mr E. D. London, F.C.A., a partner in the firm of Messrs Derbyshire & Co, Chartered Accountants, of Nottingham, has been elected President of The Nottingham Society of Chartered Accountants for the year 1965–66.

Mr E. D. London

Born in Nottingham in 1916 and educated at Mill Hill School, Mr London was articled to the late Mr H. F. Holloway of his present firm. He was admitted to membership of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales in 1938. During the Second World War he served with the South Notts Hussars and was wounded at Tobruk in December 1941. He was demobilized in 1946 with the rank of Major. Since his election to the committee of the Nottingham Society in 1957, Mr London has, from 1963, represented the Society on the Technical Advisory Committee of the Institute.

Other officers elected for the ensuing year are:

Vice-President: Mr J. Daykin, F.C.A.
Hon. Secretary: Mr R. F. Holloway, F.C.A., Messrs Derbyshire & Co, Bentinck Buildings, Wheeler Gate, Nottingham.

Annual Report

In the committee's annual report for 1964 membership of the Society at December 31st, 1964, is given as 658, a rise of 183 over the previous year's figure.

Four luncheon meetings were held during the year and the Society's biennial dinner, held in January, was attended by some 460 members and guests. The committee, states the report, has been compelled to abandon the chartered accountants' award scheme through lack of support. The purpose of the scheme was to publicize the profession in local schools and to attract the right type of boy or girl to enter articles by providing a prize of £75 to be competed for by written examination. The response on the two occasions when the examination was held was most disappointing. The report of the Society's Nottingham Chartered Accountants Students' Tuition Scheme for the year ended August 31st, 1964, states that further full-time introductory courses of three weeks' duration have been held by the Nottingham Regional College of Technology for clerks in the early stages of articles. A further course for students who have passed their Intermediate examination and who are commencing studies for their Final Part I examination has been arranged at the college for December. In addition, a third introductory course for Final Part II students is to be arranged at 'the appropriate time'. Saturday morning lectures, the report adds, have been maintained and the average attendance has improved.

The Derby Branch of the Society held two lecture meetings, one being a joint meeting with the Institute of Bankers, and two luncheon meetings both of which were well attended. Social events included the branch's annual dinner in October and a cocktail party in June.

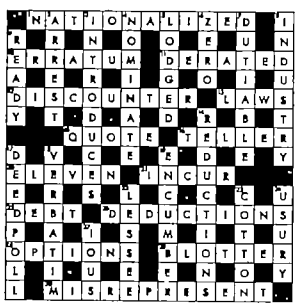
OCCUPATIONAL PENSION SCHEMES

Inquiries among employers in the United Kingdom, made by the Government Actuary last year, reveal that the total number of employed persons who are members of occupational pension schemes is provisionally estimated at about twelve million. Of these, four million are employed in the public services or in the nationalized industries, and the remaining eight million are in private employment. About ten million are men and two million are women. A previous official survey made in 1956 showed a total of eight million persons covered for pensions; the growth rate during the past eight years has been at an average rate of half a million a year.

The number of persons in receipt of a pension from occupational schemes has risen from just over one million in 1956 to about two million, of whom about one and a half million are men and half a million retired women and widows. The total annual amount of their pensions now amounts to some £350 million and another £200 million is paid each year in returns of contributions and in benefits of other kinds. Pensions range in size from less than 10s a week to £20 a week or more, with an average of some £3 10s a week.



Only about one person in ten who changes his employment has his pension rights preserved (apart from national insurance pension rights). The proportion is higher for redundancy dismissals than for voluntary withdrawals, and higher for those with long service than for those with short service. About one-half of all leavers are offered some form of preservation, but in many cases a cash refund of personal contributions is preferred.

BALANCE

The next meeting of Balance, a discussion group for younger members of the profession, will be held at the Lansdowne Club, 9 Fitzmaurice Place, London W1, on Thursday, June 24th. It will take the form of a dinner, followed by a talk by Mr A. R. Ilersic, M.SC.(ECON.), B.COM., F.I.S., reader in economics at London University, on the subject 'Accountancy v. Economics'. The dinner will cost 23s 6d per person, and any readers who are interested in attending should contact the secretary of Balance, Mr W. J. H. Everitt, 36A Porchester Terrace, London W2.

Balancing the Books

You find you've something in hand, an unexpected sum left over? This is the moment then to remember the good work of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, vital work involving young lives. The Society, which handles thousands of cases, ranging from physical cruelty to a neglect that is cruel in its consequences, every year, relies completely on voluntary legacies and donations. So, when you've something to spare, help us to help the children who need our help so badly. When advising on wills and bequests remember the N.S.P.C.C.

Last Thursday Wendy drew a straight line!

Wendy is eleven years old.

And she is a spastic. At seven, she could not even hold a ball in her hand.

So this is a very considerable achievement.

Wendy is fortunate. Not all the 75,000 spastics in Britain have the same opportunities as her. She went to one of the Spastics Society's schools, where she was taught how to compensate for her disability.

Every year the Society's homes are teaching children like Wendy how to live. But every year many hundreds more spastics do not get the teaching which would rescue them from useless and burdensome lives, simply because the Society is desperately in need of funds. The problem is urgent: every 8 hours another spastic is born.

So when you are asked to advise a client about a legacy, please remember spastics. Your client's legacy could help a spastic towards a normal life.

The Spastics Society welcomes legacies

THE POST OF THE WEEK

If one starts with the idea that nobody really wants to buy anything, then one can begin to appreciate the enormity of the task faced by advertising agencies. The way we live today, it is accepted that one buys washing powder. (Do you feel persecuted if you buy Brand X?) But which brand do you buy? Here one goes from the sublime to the ridiculous: starting off with the idea propounded above one then moves to a situation where you not only have to buy a packet, but are positively mind-boggled as to which of a multitude to choose. The public can fairly be said, these days, to be 'able to resist everything but temptation'.

Financing Local Affairs

MOST students of local government would agree that reform has been a pressing and urgent need for half a century or more. Progress has, however, been slow; not least because of the virtual impossibility of persuading the diverse interests to agree on a common policy. The situation has now been reached when it is becoming increasingly clear that before long a solution will have to be imposed from outside. The strains on the existing system arising from the inelasticity of rate revenue, the growing importance of Exchequer finance and the significance of the recently proposed regional planning bodies – to say nothing of the several Government committees currently reviewing the local scene – all presage change.

In the meantime, local authority representatives are busy preparing evidence and taking every opportunity to re-state, if not always to clarify, their thinking on the conduct of local affairs. Last week's conference of The Institute of Municipal Treasurers and Accountants at Eastbourne (reported on other pages of this issue) produced a number of talking points which, while they hardly provide a clear-cut plan for future development, nevertheless indicate an awareness of the real issues and the bases for change.

In his address, the retiring President, Mr IAN M. COWAN, M.B.E., F.S.A.A., F.I.M.T.A., was candid enough to concede that 'local government, being sheltered from the chill winds which afflict industry, must ask itself the question whether the standard of administration and management is such that it would be competitive if applied in the industrial and commercial sphere'. 'We cannot', he asserted, 'afford to regard ourselves as being in a sheltered occupation' which, to put it bluntly, is the impression that many ratepayers all too often acquire from a periodic visit to their local council offices.

The real point, as Mr COWAN stressed, is to ensure that the ratepayer gets – and feels he is getting – value for money. Members of the I.M.T.A. undoubtedly 'all too often feel themselves fighting a lonely battle against external pressures' to spend still more on new or existing services. No one, least of all the ratepayer, is satisfied with the existing control of public expenditure. Whether it be local or central spending, there seems to be no effective limit to demands on the taxpayer. The result is, as another speaker, Mr RUSSELL J. CLARK, economic adviser to the Westminster Bank, pointed out, that since the private and public sectors of the national economy must both share in the same limited resources, each successive increase in the demands of the public authorities merely restricts still more the share of the private sector. Yet, as Mr CLARK observed, it is the private sector which is responsible for the production of the goods the consumer needs and for the exports so desperately required at the present time. On the other hand, expenditure in the public sector 'makes demands on resources and generates incomes, but produces relatively few of the goods on which those incomes will be spent'.

The problem as to how public outlays can be regulated remains as far from solution as ever. In the last resort, the decision as to the share of the public sector in the national output is based on political rather than economic considerations. In consequence, as Mr CLARK noted, local authorities have remained insensitive to the high interest rates imposed to regulate the level of investment. Since the present system, whereby local authorities raise their capital, is unsatisfactory and affects adversely the money market together with the Government's control of credit, Mr CLARK contended that local authorities should borrow via the Exchequer at the same rate as the central Government.

This particular argument, supported by the Radcliffe Committee's Report on the Working of the Monetary System, is attractive. Yet to try and operate within a mixed economy a system of controls aimed at preference for the public sector, merely creates the sort of confusion which currently surrounds the market for housing loans as organized in the building society movement. There the stage has been reached where Ministers and politicians concerned with implementing an electoral promise which was – to put it no more strongly – ill-conceived, are now in effect foisting the blame for the failure to redeem it on to the building societies. The latter, not unreasonably being more concerned with trying to provide both a service to their clients and a profit to themselves, are having to take account of the economic realities of life, i.e. that depositors invest their funds where the return is highest. If the building societies are to compete in the scramble for investible funds, then they will have to pay the price and charge their clients accordingly. At the moment, however, this is not 'practical politics'.

The same confusion of thinking on economic forces and social objectives permeates local authority housing finance. The granting, at the ratepayers' expense, of housing subsidies to council tenants who are not in need has been widely condemned. The practice north of the Border has reached a stage, despite ministerial efforts to intervene, which if it arose in England would, in the words of one rating valuer at the recent Scottish Rating Conference – Mr HECTOR WILKS, A.R.C.I.S. – provoke a 'bloody revolution'. In far too many local authority areas, rent subsidies are enjoyed by council tenants whose means clearly do not warrant any such assistance.

In a thoughtful I.M.T.A. conference paper, the City Treasurer of Bradford, Mr JOHN RUSCOE, M.A., B.COM., F.I.M.T.A., pointed out that the real need at the present time was public provision of accommodation for the old, the widowed and the single – 'the only groups in which a considerable proportion do not already have suitable homes of their own'.

This does not mean that critics of local authority housing policies are against the provision of subsidized accommodation. 'The acid test', stated Mr RUSCOE, 'for any housing programme should be whether it gives assistance to those who are most deprived'. On this test the housing policies pursued by many local authorities throughout the country fail badly and the sooner local authorities concentrate not merely on building, but ensuring that suitable accommodation is allocated to the many in real need, the sooner a major social problem will be alleviated.

No intelligent critic reviewing the financial problems of local government really believes that expenditure can be slashed and the rates greatly reduced. Nevertheless, what he can and does expect is a clearer recognition of priorities for expenditure together with a much greater awareness among councillors of the fact that, however desirable improved public services may be, the public provision of collective benefits is not ipso facto more desirable than private provision or self-help.

SIDNEY BUXTON concluded his classic study of nineteenth-century finance with these words:

> 'It may be, as PEPYS remarked two centuries ago, impossible for the King to have things done as cheap as other men, but if we cannot get economy, we ought at least to have efficiency; of late we do not seem to have secured either the one or the other.'

The comment is as pertinent today as it was at the end of the last century.

Reduced Rate for Individuals

THE basic rate of capital gains tax charged on individuals is 30 per cent or 6*s* in the £. The protagonists of the tax speak of this rate as a low one, perhaps forgetting that the peacetime standard rate of income tax itself never exceeded this figure until 1946–47, and that even in 1939–40 the standard rate was only 7*s*. Bearing in mind that there are no personal or reduced rate allowances, and also that there are no tapering provisions where several years' appreciation (combined with currency depreciation) are reflected in one capital gains assessment, the rate of tax is in fact very high. It would be absurd if a taxpayer paid a higher rate on his long-term capital gains than on his income. This fact is recognized and dealt with by clause 20 of the Finance Bill.

Clause 20 (1) directs, in effect, that the capital gains tax chargeable on an individual shall not exceed what the income tax (and surtax if any) would be if he were assessed under Case VI of Schedule D on an amount equal to two-thirds of the capital gain. There is no question of paying income tax or surtax as such on the capital gain or any part of it. The formula of Case VI liability on two-thirds of the capital gain is merely the measure of the capital gains tax as a maximum amount payable. Nor is there any question of election. However, one cannot rely on the Inland Revenue of their own motion applying this maximum. It follows that if a taxpayer receives a capital gains tax notice of assessment in which he is charged at the full 30 per cent, he must immediately take steps to satisfy himself that the maximum under clause 20 is not exceeded. Again, if his income tax liability is reduced after the end of the income tax year, owing for example to error or mistake, relief or the reduction of an assessment on appeal, then he must see to it that the corresponding adjustment of the capital gains tax assessment is made. If his income tax liability is still undetermined when he receives the capital gains tax assessment, and there is the slightest chance of a section 20 adjustment becoming due, he should appeal. The income tax provisions about error or mistake relief are extended to capital gains tax by paragraph 1 (3) of Schedule 9 to the Bill, but the Inland Revenue are well known for the technical objections they take to such claims.

Clause 20 is confined in terms to an individual who is either resident in the United Kingdom for some part of the year, or who is ordinarily resident there. It does not apply to an individual who is chargeable under clause 19 (2) as trading there. To arrive at the income tax (and surtax if any) which would be chargeable on income equal to two-thirds of the capital gain, certain assumptions have to be made (clause 20 (2)). It is assumed that this notional income:

(a) is not available for set off against losses, charges, or reliefs, apart from personal allowances;

(b) is not earned income (even though the asset disposed of is property attached to an employment);

(c) is the highest part of the individual's income (notwithstanding any income tax provision that some other income is to be treated as the highest part).

'Personal reliefs' means the reliefs in Part VIII of the Income Tax Act, 1952, as applied for standard rate tax and surtax, but excluding relief for life assurance premiums. It follows that for the purpose of the 'one-sixth of total income' restriction on the total amount of life assurance premiums, the income must not be treated as increased by any part of the capital gain (clause 20 (2)). The ban on earned income relief raises the question whether it could be more advantageous for the individual to argue that his disposal was by way of trade. If the capital gain was a once-for-all one, there could be no advantage, seeing that the earned income relief is only two-ninths at the most.

For taxpayers with very small investment incomes, who are at the margin of the 'small income relief', the clause 20 reduction is unlikely to be of much value in relation to a small capital gain, since the excess of income over £450 is effectively taxed at 10*s* in the £. Elderly taxpayers who are at the margin of the old age relief are in a similar plight, since the excess income is effectively taxed at 9*s* in the £. This is an additional argument for having an exemption limit for capital gains tax, an argument which the Government has turned down. However, it may be that the two-thirds fraction will be reduced, possibly to three-fifths. The FINANCIAL SECRETARY promised the House of Commons, on May 25th, that the Government would bring forward a further proposal on clause 20 at the Report stage.

Clause 20 (4) contains some specially complicated provisions to deal with the clause 20 reduction in the case of capital gains accruing to a married woman who is living with her husband (in the income tax sense). In arriving at the income tax and surtax payable on two-thirds of the married woman's capital gains, account must be taken of income chargeable on the husband (clause 20 (4) (a)). In treating the two-thirds as the 'highest part' of the married woman's income, one must take the joint incomes (clause 20 (4) (b)). The above provisions are relatively simple where the married woman has a capital gain but her husband does not. Suppose now that both spouses have capital gains chargeable in the same tax year. How is the clause 20 restriction of capital gains tax to be applied? Paragraph (c) of clause 20 (4) makes the following directions:

(i) compute the gains tax at 30 per cent on the aggregate of both spouses' capital gains;

(ii) compute the additional income tax (and surtax if any) which the husband would have to pay if two-thirds of the aggregate capital gains of both spouses were taxed on the husband under Case VI of Schedule D.

If (i) exceeds (ii) then the capital gains tax liability is to be reduced to (ii). The amount of the reduction (i.e. (i) minus (ii)) is to be apportioned between the two spouses in proportion to their respective capital gains. In saying this, we are giving the meaning which was no doubt intended. What clause 20 (4) says [our italics] is > 'any reduction in capital gains tax effected by paragraph (c) above shall be apportioned to the husband and wife in proportion to the respective amounts on which they would, under clause 19, be chargeable to capital gains tax for the year of assessment'.

The draftsman seems to regard here the reduction in rate of tax as being a reduction in the gains on which the tax is charged. These curious words may be a vestigial remnant of provisions in an earlier draft Bill which provided for a reduction in the quantum of gains charged, rather than a reduction in tax.

Clause 20 (4) (d) provides, somewhat unnecessarily, that where there are capital gains accruing to a married woman, 'account shall be taken of the provisions of' clause 19 (5), i.e. the sub-clause which provides for the set off of one spouse's losses against the other spouse's gains in the same year. If there is an election not to apply clause 19 (5) at all 'any necessary adjustment' has to be made.

This is a convenient place to mention paragraph 3 of Schedule 9 which directs that capital gains accruing to a woman who lives with her husband are to be assessed and charged on the husband, with the familiar proviso that the amount of tax charged on the man's own capital gains is not thereby to be affected; similarly with the woman's gains. Paragraph 3 (2) permits the familiar claim to separate assessment, with effectively the same time limits as for income tax. There is provision for the requirement of returns from either spouse (paragraph 3 (3)), and sections 359–360 of the Income Tax Act, 1952, are applied mutatis mutandis (paragraph 3 (4)). Clause 20 (4) applies whether or not the married woman is separately assessed to income tax (or surtax).

The benefit of the clause 20 restriction is withheld from certain chargeable gains by clause 20 (5). These are gains from an asset

(i) disposed of within two years after acquisition; and

(ii) acquired (otherwise than as legatee) from a 'connected person'.

In the above circumstances the gain is to be assessed at the full 30 per cent. Moreover, if clause 20 relief has been given against any other chargeable gain in the same year of the same individual (or the spouse of such individual), then no loss is to be set off against the chargeable gain first mentioned.

CORPORATION TAX

What is a Close Company? – I

MANY provisions of the new Finance Bill are devoted to inflicting, with special severity, corporation tax, income tax and surtax, on 'close companies' and on various kinds of person having some connection with close companies. Running like a thread through these complicated provisions is the unspoken inference that close companies are a mere façade for the nefarious operations of dedicated tax dodgers. One might imagine, therefore, that a close company was a very special kind of company; something like the rare company which in palmier days of surtax avoidance was set up to buy the life interest of some pampered scion of the aristocracy so that he could enjoy the revenues of his vast estates free of surtax.

No one knows how many close companies there are, but there must be well over a quarter of a million. The CHIEF SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY recently told the House of Commons that the number of companies potentially liable to surtax direction under section 245 of the Income Tax Act, 1952, was believed to be about that number. It has also been said on behalf of the Government that the number of close companies will not be much higher. This seems a highly doubtful proposition, bearing in mind that the definition of close company goes much wider than the definition of a company within section 245.

Even if one accepts the figure of a quarter of a million, it is manifest that a company which contrives not to be a close company must be the exception rather than the rule. After all, there are only about three hundred thousand companies altogether. It is therefore very misleading of the Finance Bill to speak of close companies as though they were something exceptional. In this respect the provisions resemble the old General Rule 16 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, which spoke of married women who lived with their husbands as though this was unusual.

Clauses 69 to 74 of the Bill bear the cross-heading 'Close companies'. Clause 74 directs that the provisions of Schedule 17 shall have effect for the interpretation and operation of 'the foregoing sections' relating to close companies; for the modification of those sections in certain cases; and 'for other purposes'. Clauses 69 to 73 have effect subject to Schedule 17. Part I of that schedule, headed 'Interpretation Generally', consists of six paragraphs of interpretation of the following expressions:

'associated company'	paragraph 2
'control'	paragraph 3 (1)
'member'	paragraph 3 (2)
'nominee'	paragraph 3 (3)
'participator'	paragraph 4 (1)
'loan creditor'	paragraph 4 (2)
'associate'	paragraph 5
'director'	paragraph 6 (1)
'whole-time service director' ..	paragraph 6 (3)

The word 'company' is not here defined because clause 42 (4) provides that throughout Part IV of the Bill (which includes clauses 69 to 74), 'company' means 'any body corporate or unincorporated association, but does not include a partnership'. This definition does not apply if 'the context otherwise requires'. Moreover it is subject to clauses 62 and 63, dealing with local authorities and unit trusts.

We come now to the general definition of 'close company' in paragraph 1 (1) of Schedule 17. It is one which is under the control of

(i) five or fewer participators; or

(ii) participators who are directors.

Test (i) is similar to the old surtax test; test (ii) is new in this connection, but of course familiar in profits tax law. Unlike the old definition of surtax direction companies, there is no exclusion in favour of a company 'in which the public are substantially interested'. This means that a large number of companies whose shares are regularly quoted and dealt in on stock exchanges will nevertheless be close companies. The general definition is widened by paragraph 1 (2) in a manner reminiscent of section 256

(1) (c) of the Income Tax Act, 1952. Paragraph 1 (2) works as follows. Assume that the company is a close company. Then compute the amount which for surtax purposes would fall to be apportioned among the participators on that assumption. Then see whether more than one-half of that amount would fall to be apportioned to as few as five or less of the participators, or to the directors as a whole. If the answer is 'Yes', the company is a close company. If the answer is 'No' then apply a further test. Assume that the company and other companies are subject to apportionments. Then see whether the combined effect of the apportionments could be such that more than one-half of the apportioned amount could eventually go to five or fewer participators in the company, or to the directors of the company. If the answer to this is 'Yes' then the company is a close company. Well did Mr DIAMOND, the CHIEF SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY, tell the House of Commons that 'for the business man of the future life will be simplicity itself'.

Of course there are exclusions. A company which has not committed the cardinal error of being resident in the United Kingdom cannot be a close company (paragraph 1 (1) (2)). Then there are the old favourites compendiously defined in paragraph 1 (1) (b) and which may be listed as follows:

(1) registered industrial and provident societies (e.g. a 'co-op' society) within section 442 of the Income Tax Act, 1952;

(2) societies incorporated under the Building Societies Act, 1874;

(3) unincorporated societies as mentioned in section 7 of the Building Societies Act, 1874.

There are not more than eight societies in category 3.

The next exclusion is of more general importance in that it excludes companies which are controlled by non-close companies. It will be recalled that section 256 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1952, excluded what it called a 'subsidiary company' from the surtax direction field. Section 256 (4) defined 'subsidiary company' by, in effect, excluding from the 'five or fewer persons' any company which was not itself a surtax direction company. The new exclusion is in paragraph 1 (3) where, as has been pointed out by The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, the drafting seems to have gone awry. The first part of paragraph 1 (3) says:

> 'A company is not to be treated as a close company in any case where:
> (a) by reason of beneficial ownership of shares in the company the control of it is in the hands of a company which is not a close company or of two or more companies none of which is a close company; and [sic]
> (b) it could only be treated as a close company as being under the control of five or fewer participators, and it cannot be so treated except by taking as one of the participators a company which is not a close company; . . .'

As these words stand, the company must satisfy both (a) and (b) if it is to escape close company status. It seems that the word 'and' which we have put in italics should read 'or'. As regards test (b), it is arguable that where, for instance, three individuals and two non-close companies together control 51 per cent of the share capital, the company is a close company; whereas if there are four individuals and one only non-close company together controlling 51 per cent of the shares, the controlled company escapes.

'Beneficial ownership' is not defined. Where it occurs in the Stamp Duty Acts, the Inland Revenue always argue for a very restricted construction. One would expect the phrase to occur again in the definition of 'control' but it does not.

For the purposes of applying the (a) and (b) tests, any reference to a 'close company' is to be treated as including a company resident abroad which, if it were resident in the United Kingdom, would be a close company. For a simple example of the effect of this, one can say that the device of having a company controlled by non-resident companies will not work.

Although the expression 'associated company' plays no part in the meaning of 'close company', it is convenient to record here the meaning given to it by paragraph 2 for the purposes of the close company provisions. Companies A. and B. are 'associated' at a particular time if, at that time or at any time within one year previously,

(1) A. has control of B; or

(2) B. has control of A; or

(3) the same person(s) have control of A. and B.

Association's New Salvo on Finance Bill

WHEN, on June 2nd, the House of Commons debated an Opposition motion to defer the introduction of the corporation tax, Mr JOEL BARNETT referred in the debate to a memorandum by his 'own association'. He said there was much in it with which he could agree but he criticized some of the comments. Mr BARNETT was quoting from one of two memoranda sent last month by the Council of The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants to the CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, and released last week.

Whatever may be said of the tone of the Association's comments, there is no doubt that certain of the points made in the memoranda have now been met by Government amendments; others bid fair to be met in later amendments to be introduced by the Government at the Report stage. One of the many points which have not been met, however, is the retention of two separate taxes on capital gains, depending on the period of retention of the capital asset. In fact, in a leading article in our issue of May 29th, we pointed out that effectively there are three sets of current taxes on capital gains.

On the vexed question of chattels, the Association observes that a gift of a chattel valued at £500 would be taxable whereas the sale of the same chattel would not. This was denied by the MINISTER WITHOUT PORTFOLIO on May 24th. Although the MINISTER did not explain this denial, the answer seems to lie in the fact that while the rubric to clause 17 (1) speaks of 'sales' of chattels for £1,000 or less, the body of clause 17 (1) refers generally to disposals. Moreover, clause 17 (1) has to be construed as one with Chapter II of Part II of the Finance Act, 1962. Included in that chapter is section 12 (3). This provides that in the case of gifts etc. one assumes a consideration equal to the market value. Although the denial rests on good grounds, it is none the less extremely regrettable that one can construe the new Bill only by thumbing one's way through the Income Tax Acts in general.

On long-term capital gains tax, the Association rightly makes the point that clarification is necessary in relation to persons who are or have been non-resident. If a person becomes resident in the U.K. and then disposes of an asset abroad, he will be liable on capital gains which may have been accruing mainly while he resided abroad. This anomaly will increase in severity as time goes by. The Association also states that clause 37 provides for the imposition of tax on a person who holds shares in a non-resident company which makes a capital gain; whereas the member is not entitled to claim any loss which the company incurs. The Association rightly says that it is illogical to tax a notional gain without allowing a loss on the same notion. A holder of not more than 5 per cent of the shares is now to be exempted, but clause 37 is still inequitable.

The most severe strictures in the Association's memoranda fall on the provisions aimed against close companies. The very wide meaning of close company is the subject of another leading article in this issue. The Council of the Association is advised that a very large number of the companies affected are in fact companies quoted on the United Kingdom stock exchanges, quite apart from the fact that the vast majority of private companies will fall within the definition.

The Association makes the following specific suggestions:

(i) The old definition of surtax direction companies should be retained.

(ii) Provision should be made to exempt minimum profits from charge to income tax on shortfalls from a minimum distribution, even in the case of associated companies.

(iii) If directors' remuneration is to be restricted at all, the restriction should permit £6,000 per full-time director.

(iv) There should be no charge where dividends are not less than those paid in the past.

(v) The onus of proving inadequacy of distribution should fall on the Revenue.

(vi) Sixty per cent distribution as a minimum is completely unsound; 30 per cent should be substituted.

A Plan for Accountancy Education – I

by KENNETH S. MOST, LL.B., F.C.A.
Head of the School of Accountancy, Singapore Polytechnic

IN a stimulating three-part article published in The Accountant during July and August 1964, Professor W. T. Baxter, B.COM., C.A., drew attention to some of the factors which will influence the accountancy profession in future years. One of these, the growth of higher education, is already causing accountancy education to drift from traditional to more formal patterns and the time has come to consider what type of professional education a public institution should provide, so that rational choice may prevail over historical accident. It is no coincidence that this problem is also being faced elsewhere at the present time.[1]

Is it Necessary?

There is still a substantial weight of professional opinion against the extension of academic studies in this field. In his paper 'The Changing Pattern of Further Education' (The Accountant, August 1st, 1964), Dr O. G. Pickard showed how even skilled craftsmen are benefiting from formal courses; that technicians and technologists require such courses appeared to him self-evident.

The claim that practical experience is the only sound basis for accountants' training is justified; accountancy education does not seek to train accountants. We must always distinguish between what can be taught and what can only be learnt. Any subject with a sufficiently developed theoretical structure and a body of literature can be taught, and will be more economically assimilated in an educational institution than in a practical context. Accounting theory, law, economics and statistics fall under this heading, whereas the practice of accounting, taxation and auditing probably do not. It is advisable to keep this distinction in mind when planning accountancy studies.

The argument reappears in another form elsewhere: that it is advisable for accountancy recruits to pursue a quite distinct course of study in order to arrive in their profession with a broader outlook. It is possible that all of us can benefit from a plurality of studies; that the lawyer who has studied engineering first will be a better lawyer because of it, and that an architect who first graduates in inorganic chemistry will design better buildings in consequence. This is beside the point, for we are determining whether it is necessary to study accountancy in an academic institution, not whether it is advisable to study something else as well. The answer must be 'Yes, if the subject is capable of being taught by formal educational techniques'. As for the broader outlook, the manner in which the professional core of the course is related to other fields of knowledge then becomes a practical problem of syllabus construction and teaching practice.

Accountancy and Law

Given the necessity to provide academic courses in accountancy, it is important to observe the close relationship which has always existed between law and accountancy. Indeed, in some countries the absence of academically-educated accountants has led to the use of academically-educated lawyers for accountancy functions. Throughout the ages, developments of law have been accompanied by developments of accountancy – mercantile law, and the law pertaining to the administration of the estates of deceased persons are examples of some antiquity.

During the last hundred years, however, this relationship has been particularly marked. To begin with, the creation of a recognized profession of accountants in England has been traced directly to the increase in commercial bankruptcies which took place during the last century. The lawyers engaged on settling the estates of bankrupts and liquidating companies found it necessary to obtain accountancy services, and eventually abandoned the work to accountants.

A second phenomenon was the passing of a series of Companies Acts which progressively lowered the price of incorporation. These Acts attempted to introduce safeguards for shareholders and creditors; most important, they required that directors should submit accounts to shareholders and that public companies should file annual accounts with a Registrar of Companies, for public inspection. The final protection was the requirement that these accounts should be audited. Both the necessity to render accounts and the provision for audit stimulated accountancy's growth in the second half of the nineteenth century, and this influence has continued in the twentieth through amendments which tend to increase the scope of the accountant and auditor. In addition to these tasks, the legal work of the company secretary has become practically exclusive to accountants, only the most complex aspects being reserved for lawyers.

The third important influence was the growth of public expenditure and the accompanying increase in taxation. It has been found impossible to administer any system of taxation without calling upon accountants to establish facts, clarify issues, interpret the law and even adjudicate. The great increase in the number of accountants which one finds in the twentieth century is directly attributable to this cause.

Indeed, no accountant is able to forget for one moment the way in which law impinges upon the practice of his profession. It would seem that the function of law in establishing an acceptable organization for society, within which men can live and work happily and constructively, cannot be adequately discharged without the intervention of accountants. In other words, the role of the accountant is social as well as commercial and economic; he is not concerned solely with measuring, recording and interpreting the transactions of commercial and other areas where money is used, but also with reconciling the divergent interests of different sections of the community in so far as this reconciliation cannot be effected by legislative enactment. The more complex the law, the greater the need for accountants.

One may point to two areas in which this interrelationship is being worked out at the present time. In recent years the accountant has become suddenly aware of the law of trusts; never totally ignorant, he now has to steep himself in equity. The use of the trust in place of other forms of property holding has increased greatly; not only for tax avoidance, but for pension schemes, insurance and various investment situations, the trust has proved to be a more flexible instrument than the company.

A similar development can be discerned commencing in respect of the co-operative system, and it may well be that this is the field in which the future social contribution of the accountant will be most marked. Co-operative housing, co-operative marketing, co-operative production – all of these will provide a great deal of work for accountants.

Accountancy and Economics

Another relationship exists: that between accountancy and economics. Wherever accountancy is taught at a university in the United Kingdom, the U.S.A. or the Commonwealth, it is usually joined with economics, although this is not necessarily the case elsewhere. It is interesting, therefore, to consider why university economists have sponsored accountancy studies in order to determine whether this is a new departure which would have obvious significance for accountancy education, or whether there is some particular reason which cannot be expected to provide the kind of development which has been seen attaching accountancy to law.

Economics is concerned primarily with theories about human behaviour. This theoretical emphasis might appear at first sight to render accountancy incompatible, but it seems that economists have also found it necessary to call upon accountancy to supplement their other methods of investigation and analysis. One branch of this movement arose through studies of the firm, and led them into making various types of cost analysis; the other stimulated them into developing forms of national income and social accounting for political economic studies, using the same basic model as is used by accountants.

Unlike the lawyers, however, economists have never subcontracted their work in this field, and it is instructive to observe the reason. To the economist, 'accounting' is a research tool and has no social implications beyond this. Thus, an accountant may teach an economics student the elements of accounting so that he may use the technique as an economist; that is all. We are indebted to economists for drawing our attention to problems which we have tended to neglect – for clarifying cost concepts and introducing us to the idea of opportunity cost; for pointing out the importance of valuation in profit measurement and the implications of price level changes; for awakening us to the possibility of structural analysis offered by our linked series of consistently prepared accounts. But this contribution, valuable though it is, cannot be compared with the fertilization which accountancy has received from the law. It may be compared with the way in which electronics has extended the accountant's range by providing him with additional sets of brains – a revolutionary enough situation on its own. So the engineer acknowledges his debt to the physicist, the linguist to archeologists and the lawyer to historians.

Here we see the essence of our problem in attempting to foresee future demands on the accountant. On the one hand, he is now heavily involved in auditing, taxation, company administration, the design and operation of systems of financial and cost reporting, in bankruptcies and liquidations and the administration of the estates of deceased persons, and accountancy students must be prepared for the work they will be required to do in these fields. On the other hand, new pulls are being felt from different directions: economists requiring assistance in their theoretical studies; business anxious to improve its flow of useful information and basing much of it on accounting forms and data; and beyond this, Governments, trade associations and individual firms inviting a collaboration which often extends beyond financial matters into all aspects of their activities.

It seems clear that preparation for such many and varied functions must be based upon a study of accounting, law, economics and organization. It seems equally clear that it cannot flourish as an appendage of a course devoted primarily to economics, or law, or commerce. True, accountancy will have to be invited into existing academic institutions, and we owe a debt of gratitude to those far-sighted professors of economics who have taken the lead in this respect. It would be important, however, for the link with law to be re-established, and this not only for the benefit of accountancy students. The accountant's contribution to civilization will continue to be derived from the law; new forms of social organization, at present only the subject of discussion, will in due course become recognized by legislation, and legislators must be made aware of the assistance which they can obtain from the accountant. The field of taxation offers an awful example of what can happen when the law fails to make use of accountancy as a flexible instrument for reconciling a diversity of interests.

The Specialization Problem

Should specialization be encouraged in professional accountancy studies? Certainly, at some stage of the accountant's career, but not at the outset.

The accountant finds his role in society in one or more clearly distinct areas: public practice, Government, business trade associations, educational and charitable institutions and so on. It is tempting, therefore, to stratify accountancy education into similar specialist streams, to ensure the supply of tomorrow's professionals.

When we examine the work of the accountant in each of these areas, however, we find that functional specialization cuts across them. The specialist in taxation in public practice finds his counterpart in business and in Government service; not only business accountants but also local government accountants are heavily involved in management accounting. There is thus no very substantial case as to what constitutes the subject-matter of a specialized course.

If a student be asked to specialize before even beginning his career, moreover, then he is being asked to look five, perhaps ten, years ahead to what the community's requirements will be in the years following his graduation. This is a vision granted only to few, and mistakes may produce the very opposite situation to that intended. Such decisions are usually strongly influenced by conditions prevailing at the time they are made, and the probability is great that the factors which have led to the existing demand have already begun to disappear.

It would seem preferable, in the interests both of the student and the society which he will serve, for specialization to come either at the end of the course of study or else at a later period. If this view were ever accepted, then the way would be opened to a common accountancy course for all entrants to the profession, irrespective of the branch they were later to pursue, followed by specialist courses to be taken once the key decision had been made. It may be argued that experience in a public accountant's office after graduation is, in fact, the only satisfactory training for the exercise of the profession of public accountant. This would lead to the quite logical position that whilst all accountants could become members of their professional associations, and thus maintain and even promote the standards of the profession, only those accountants who had completed their studies by a period of practical public accountancy would be entitled to practise under this name.

This article has demonstrated the social function of accountancy and placed emphasis upon the range of duties which this function may require accountants to perform. It is argued that accountancy education should be equally broad, so that the professional accountant shall be fully able to take advantage of the opportunities which are now, and in the future will be, open to him.

MAINLY FOR STUDENTS

Verification of Prime Records

by J. A. CHORLEY, F.C.A.
Divisional Chief Internal Auditor, South Western Division, National Coal Board

AFTER a few years, the articled or audit clerk's day-to-day work on audits may appear to have no purpose. This is because one nominal ledger looks the same as any other, the list of balances required to be checked is endless. The completion of audit programmes becomes the prime target and one has always the comfortable feeling that one is expected only to be watchdog and not a bloodhound.

The audit staff visit numerous firms covering a variety of trades and professions and should, at the end of each audit, be able to evaluate the control or lack of control exercised by the firm over its activities.

One of the auditor's tasks is to satisfy himself that the controls are such as to ensure the income is fully accounted for and whether expenditure is properly incurred and accounted for – this will necessitate examination of the prime records.

The Members' Handbook of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales helps us in the nature and extent of test to be applied to prime records. The statement on General Principles of Auditing, U 1, paragraphs 16 to 22, are the paragraphs that guide us and the following quotation from paragraph 17 will be our text for the purposes of this paper:

> 'It is important to include examinations "in depth" among the tests to be applied. Examination "in depth" involves tracing a transaction through its various stages from origin to conclusion, examining at each stage to an appropriate extent the vouchers, records and authorities relating to that stage and observing the incidence of internal check and delegated authority.'

Income

It is not sufficient to vouch copy, sales invoices or summaries to the sales journal for a period without examining the records from which the sales invoices or summaries were made. The auditor should therefore follow through all the source documents prepared until he arrives at the prime records made by the dispatch clerks in the case of a manufacturing business or the sales assistants in respect of a retail business.

You, as audit clerk, may find yourself in an office a hundred miles away from the originating source. What do you do? Do you just accept the head office summaries and press on with completing the programme, or do you attempt to verify the source document? The least you would do is to require the source documents for a period to be sent to you. Should the source documents be prepared within a reasonable distance of where you are conducting the audit, then the obvious way to verify them is to go to the actual place of origination.

This will provide you with access to a factory, depot or shop. It will provide you with a better understanding of the company you are auditing; it will, if you are an auditor, provide you with an opportunity to ask numerous questions relating to the company's business and the most important thing of all, provide an opportunity to exercise your powers of observation.

If, for example, during the previous week when vouching 500 invoices to the purchase journal you vouched a payment of £1,000 for painting the same premises that you are now visiting to check prime records, what are the chances –

(1) that you remembered the £1,000 invoice?
(2) even if you remember, will you trouble yourself to see if the painting has been done?

This is the difference between the auditor who merely ticks, and the auditor who thinks, listens and looks and, most important of all, remembers.

However, to return to the source documents, you are now in the dispatch area, what do you do? You see a lorry being loaded; you ask who is responsible for the counting and measuring; you ask to whom the load is going and why; you ask to see the order, who made the order and how did it come to be made. If the answer is 'by telephone message from the sales office' you will then proceed to the sales office and see their records of issuing orders; you may find a customer who is not in the sales ledger, you may find 101 things – a hundred may be right or 101 may be right; but the important point is that you have approached the task of verification of the income of the company by positive means.

You have seen a lot of people, you have asked a lot of questions; this alone is a great moral check. You have gone to discover whether the whole of the income is fully recorded, not whether the recorded income is correctly recorded. You will probably find nothing wrong – so much the better, but you have made contact with the organization you are auditing and this is important.

Normally, at most offices visited by auditors, there is a Mr X. employed by the firm you are auditing, who can answer all your queries. And Mr X. becomes the auditor, not you. Where a number of questions have to be asked, I suggest that the proper persons to ask are those actually dealing with the problems you want answered. To overcome Mr X. therefore, an intensive audit of a small sample of prime records is necessary.

Expenditure

Wages

In dealing with wages, what are we looking for, what are we trying to do?

Firstly, we must test whether the men on the payroll exist – check signing-on records, National Insurance number.

Secondly, did they work the times stated on the payroll? Examine time clock cards, foremen's time books.

Thirdly, did they receive the money stated on the payroll? Examine signed pay-ticket counterfoils, issue of pay dockets.

The quickest way is to witness a pay-out of workmen – this establishes the first and third points. The verification of time worked, especially week-end overtime, is difficult. Reference to the internal check procedure on pre-authorization of overtime and authority and necessity for overtime worked may help.

You will complete the wages audit possibly with some doubts in your mind – to have doubts in your mind is the only way to becoming a good auditor. A 100 per cent auditor without any doubts is not an adult person.

Services

The cost of services in modern industry is very high – from window cleaning, engineering maintenance to plant and lorry hire, advertising, consultants and audit fees. You may well find that the cost of window cleaning is more than the audit fee but your real task is to ensure that the services were actually received. It is not sufficient for the invoices to be signed by an official. Does the invoice signatory work at or even visit the location at which the service was rendered? Does he actually know the hours the hired equipment was employed? If not, ask him how he confirmed the invoice. He may well be able to produce evidence that the work had been performed. You are, at this stage, looking for fraudulent invoices. You would be embarrassed if you passed large amounts paid for work not, or only partially, done. It may be called 'snooping' or many other names, but you will be carrying out an audit, and not a ticking and totting exercise.

There are no simple rules for verifying services other than continually asking for evidence. The type of service and company varies – your audit programme will no doubt cover many of the points – be sure you understand the programme – it was written for a purpose – to complete it without knowing the purpose makes a nonsense of auditing.

Stores

A large volume of invoices concern the purchase of consumable or resaleable stores. How do we examine the invoice? We would question unusual purchases for the type of company we are examining. We would select a batch of invoices and ask to see the orders, the authorities and system of ordering, the contracts entered into and that normal commercial contract procedure was practised. We should want to see the goods received note, compare the date of the goods received note with the invoice; question any large time lapse between invoice date of dispatch and date of goods received note; if possible, see the man who makes the goods received note. Does he check? Can he check it? Is it of any real value as a document of receipt? We are now back to prime record verification.

If, after doing this, you have no queries or doubts, you are not really trying. You should find you have a number of questions to ask and from the answers you are given, you will have further questions – this is auditing, trying to establish the facts, not by examination of percentages, although they can help, not by examining neatly balanced ledgers, but by first deciding what you are looking for, and not giving up until you have found satisfaction.

The examination of the records and vouchers covering the consumption of stores is as important as the receipt. There is more than one gentleman who has discovered that by doubling the quantities actually issued it is not too difficult either to dispose of the surplus or have invoices made for goods that will never be received. By reading the newspapers you will have gathered you are living in an immoral world where crime does pay. This is aggravated by the inability or disinclination of people to do what they are paid to do – so I would not expect you to contribute to this sad state of affairs.

Year-end Stocks and Work in Progress

The inflation or deflation of year-end inventories of stocks, of stores and products is probably the most common incident met by auditors. I need not enumerate the reasons for such manipulations.

It can be argued that any under- or over-valuation of stocks will automatically be carried forward and adjusted in the following year. However, there is the possibility of multiplying these discrepancies annually, until the manipulation achieves a serious proportion. The sooner corrective action is taken the better; the auditor should be in a position to take it.

Here, once again, we refer to prime records; in this case stock cards at operating units and work in progress original records. The stock sheets presented may have been compiled from perpetual inventories or by actual physical count.

If physical count has taken place and there are no permanent inventories with which to compare this count, then you will be forced to examine the stocks yourself and test check some of the items listed. By taking a sample of the larger items you will obtain, even by a cursory examination, some satisfaction of physically seeing some of the items listed, and at the same time seeing that they are in a usable state and are not redundant and obsolete stocks.

Fixed Assets

The verification that the total of fixed assets is represented by assets in existence according to the type of company you are dealing with, can be very easy or very difficult, depending on the nature of the business you are auditing.

Motor vehicles cause little trouble – they are easily physically verified and the log books provide further evidence. But if you have a factory with large amounts of plant and machinery to deal with, you should refer to factory records of plant and if these are not available you are reduced, once again, to attempting some form of physical verification of a reasonable sample.

The scrapping of plant is an action which may not be recorded in the ledgers you have so faithfully ticked; the examination of salvage, in view of the current price of non-ferrous metals, is a worth-while exercise.

Internal Check and Control

You will remember that our 'text' from the English Institute's Handbook refers to

> 'examining at each stage to an appropriate extent the vouchers, records and authorities relating to that stage and observing the incidence of internal check and delegated authority'.

By examining the selected transactions from their source to the finality, you will have established who originates the original records, who checks the events recorded, who supervises the events and who summarizes and finally produces the accounting record.

When you are completing the check list on internal control for the audit you are undertaking, you will now be far better informed to answer the questions contained in the check list. Again, you will be answering from your own observations and not from the answers given by the convenient Mr X.

Electronic Data Processing

This lecture would be old-fashioned if I made no reference to electronic data processing.

With the advent of electronic data processing a far larger amount of time will be spent by the auditor on the verification of prime records, first, because the analysis, arithmetic and accounting produced by electronic data processing installations will be far more accurate and will not require the time currently spent on checking manual systems. The auditor of an electronic data processing system will have available a variety of control figures for checking reasonableness, completeness and validity, etc., of the sales, wages, stores and general accounting of a system which would have 'built-in' internal control.

Auditing 'around the computer' assumes that there is still available after electronic data processing installation, all the documents in plain language that existed prior to the electronic data processing installation. Therefore, the audit could be conducted in the same manner as in the past, mainly ignoring the computer.

Auditing 'through the computer' requires of the auditor a knowledge of programming, block diagrams and system analysis. Once this knowledge has been gained, the auditor is able to follow the computer processes and conduct an audit of the documents processed.

Whichever of these methods or combination of these methods is adopted, the greatest number of continuing errors will result from the examination of the prime documents which are converted as input data to the computer.

The prime records produced by the stores clerk, the timekeeper and the dispatch clerk will still be done manually and will still contain human and other errors that the auditor cannot ignore.

Conclusion

By your attempts to verify the prime records, you will have ventured on to the shop-floor, the dispatch points and depots. You will have met managers, clerks, technicians and assistants – the world of reality, not the world encased by four walls and a desk. I would like to quote from Mr Peter Wilsher's article which appeared in The Sunday Times on 'The Great Salad Oil Scandal', on November 15th last.

> 'One of the factors that most of the great swindles have in common is the demonstration of the great gulf that exists between the world of paper and the world of things. Bankers and lawyers and brokers and accountants, however shrewd, often have only the dimmest idea of what goes on in factories and warehouses and pig-farms and stockyards.'

The greatest disease of auditors is boredom that reduces them to clerks. It has been stated recently that the up-and-coming accountant is one who looks to the future, gazes at the stars and a seat on the board. I would prefer to think of the future accountant as one who looks at the past and present, and as the result has become an informed observer of events.

You are more likely to achieve advancement by training yourself as a skilled observer, than by gazing at the stars and planning for the future; plans, in so many cases, turn out to be just a dream.

MUNICIPAL TREASURERS' NEW PRESIDENT

MR HERBERT KEELING, F.I.M.T.A., Borough Treasurer of Worthing, was installed as President of The Institute of Municipal Treasurers and Accountants for 1965-66 on June 11th (as briefly announced in our last issue) at the annual conference of the Institute held in Eastbourne.

Mr Herbert Keeling

Mr Keeling commenced his career in local government at Wallasey in 1925 and was admitted to membership of The Institute of Municipal Treasurers and Accountants in 1931, having gained First Place and Prize in the Final examination. He later served for a year in the City Treasurer's Office at Nottingham and was appointed Deputy Borough Treasurer of Luton in 1936. Three years later he became Deputy Borough Treasurer of Southampton, and in 1948 he took up his present post.

Elected to the Council of the Institute in 1956, Mr Keeling has served as a member of the Accounts and Rating Committee and the Examinations Committee since 1956 and as Chairman of the General Purposes Committee. He has been a member of the Editorial and Publicity Committee since 1963 and, in addition, from 1949–60, acted as an Institute Examiner and Assessor. Chairman of the Institute's Sussex Students' Society in 1951, Mr Keeling was subsequently secretary of the South Thames Section of the Institute's Metropolitan Home Counties Branch from 1952–56.

He is financial adviser to the Association of Municipal Corporations, and in 1958 he visited Nigeria under the auspices of the Colonial Office to conduct a course on local government finance at Ibadan University.

The new Vice-President of the Institute is Mr Richard Partington, F.I.M.T.A., Treasurer, Eaton R.D.C.

SCOTTISH INSTITUTE STATEMENT ON PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT

UNDER the rules of The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland the only offence which may give rise to disciplinary proceedings against any member is 'professional misconduct (which expression shall include any act or default discreditable to a member of the Institute)'. Without in any way departing from this general proposition, the Council of the Institute has now thought it advisable, in view of the growth of 'new specializations' within the profession, to issue a statement for the guidance of members on advertising, solicitation and related matters.

While it has been generally accepted in the past that a member may not engage in any form of self-publicity as a means of attracting business and, also, that he may do nothing through the medium of a company in relation to his professional livelihood which he cannot do as an individual, it is now realized that these restrictions if applied to certain modern circumstances might leave members at a serious disadvantage. Accordingly, the Council has suggested acceptable lines of conduct in cases where members are identified with the formation of specialist companies or other organizations providing management accounting, management consultancy and mechanized accounting and computer services or supplying investment or financial advice.

As might be expected of two professional bodies with the same high ethical standards, the guidance given by the Council of the Scottish Institute harmonizes with the statement on management consultancy contained in the proceedings of the May meeting of the Council of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales and published in our issue of May 15th. Although in this instance the Scottish Institute's statement covers a wider field, other previous pronouncements by the English Institute confirm that the approach on both sides of the Border to these new developments in the profession's range of activities is thoroughly realistic and their Councils are to be congratulated on making their views known so clearly.

F.B.I. INDUSTRIAL SURVEY

EVER since the Budget there has been some concern that restrictionist fiscal and credit policies might halt the current industrial boom. Support for these fears is now provided by the latest survey of industrial trends carried out by the Federation of British Industries. Admittedly output is still rising and labour shortages are widespread; but there are some significant shifts in opinions regarding the future, in particular among the smaller firms. Inevitably the latter will have the most to fear from a protracted 'credit squeeze'.

Whereas the major restrictionist factor has hitherto been the shortage of all types of labour, more than half the 1,085 respondent firms refer to the fact that future orders or sales may well be inadequate to maintain current output. Just as the small firms are most concerned about finance and credit facilities, so they differ from the larger firms in their attitude towards capital expenditure. Large firms anticipate maintaining their existing plans, but the smaller firms now report a prospect of substantial reductions, both in respect of new building and of plant and machinery.

These findings are borne out by the Board of Trade's latest provisional estimates of industrial capital expenditure in the first quarter of 1965.

Seasonally adjusted expenditure figures are only slightly higher than in the previous quarter, after a continuous and steep rise throughout 1964.

Curiously enough, the most optimistic replies to the F.B.I. survey are in the field of exports, where the rising volume of export orders supports the view that export prospects over the coming year are satisfactory. It is noticeable, however, that 56 per cent of the respondent firms believe that rising prices may prove the most serious limiting factor in expanding exports.

TRADE GAP WIDENS

THE May external trade figures may have been adversely affected by special factors but they were immediately followed by a weakening of sterling on Tuesday when the month's results were announced. The visible trade gap was £109 million, the worst since last November.

Special factors were at work to raise imports to the record level of £501 million. For example, May was the first full month to experience the 5 per cent cut in the import surcharge. There seems to have been a large release of goods from bond from Western Europe and these were probably waiting for the cut in the surcharge. By and large, the latest figures indicate that the effect of the surcharge since its start has not been a resounding success.

Exports were disappointing. They dropped in May by £8 million to £379 million. The Quarterly Bulletin of the Bank of England published on Wednesday, and referred to in the following note, stresses the seriousness of the economic situation and doubts whether the public as yet fully realizes 'the extent of the crisis from which the country is emerging'. There may be some comfort in the thought that the Bank thinks that the economy is emerging from it. The latest trade figures indicate that the process is a slow one and that it will not be long before the £ has to take seasonal pressure in the autumn. It is the narrowness of this time gap as well as the width of the trade gap which now causes concern.

FAIR WARNING

THE publication this week of the Bank of England Quarterly Bulletin concurrently with the announcement of the May overseas trade figures serves to underline the gravity of the trade gap. The Bulletin stresses that higher imports are due to the high level of economic activity, including private spending. It is clear that cuts must be made; the only question is how.

Is it feasible to intensify the 'credit squeeze', which so far has hardly affected the economy with all the implications for employment and plant utilization that a deflationary policy entails? Or will the Government prefer to try and retain existing restrictions on imports? Such a course may well be compatible with the need for international support for sterling.

The obvious and immediate need is higher taxes on spending, for example, the regulator or more especially the purchase tax. But with wage awards so outstripping production it has limited possibilities. The Bulletin clearly recognizes these facts, but all it can do is to warn the public and the Government of the dangers ahead.

PROJECTED LANCASHIRE P.A.Y.E. CENTRE

THE Secretary of the Inland Revenue Staff Federation told its conference on June 3rd that a new £1 million North-west Inland Revenue automated centre was to be set up, where 2,000 taxmen would handle three million P.A.Y.E. taxpayers. He said that the Inland Revenue, the Ministry of Public Building and Works, and the Regional Planning Authority had recommended Bootle, where 500 council houses were promised by 1970. The Federation had suggested, according to The Times of June 4th, Blackpool too, but there might not be the same availability of houses. We might also add that although Blackpool would possibly be much pleasanter for the staff, it would be farther off from the main population centres, which presumably it is intended to serve.

LEASEHOLD ENFRANCHISEMENT

IMPROVED legislative protection and better mortgage facilities for long-term residential leaseholders are recommended by the Chartered Societies' Joint Committee, representing the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors, the Chartered Land Agents' Society and the Chartered Auctioneers' and Estate Agents' Institute, in a memorandum to the Minister of Housing and Local Government published on Tuesday.

The recommendations are made as an alternative to compulsory leasehold enfranchisement (giving the lessee the right to purchase the freehold) which the Societies oppose.

The specific recommendations to assist and protect residential leaseholders are:

(i) extension of the principles of Part II of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954, to residential leaseholders, giving them the same protection as the Act at present gives to lessees of business premises;
(ii) better use of mortgage facilities for those with the problem of the short residue (when leases have less than a certain number of years to run, lessees find it difficult to sell them because potential buyers often cannot obtain mortgages);
(iii) compensation for improvements carried out by the lessee;
(iv) consolidation of legislation on landlord and tenant into a residential leaseholders' Act; and
(v) better publicity to dispel ignorance and ensure awareness of rights.

Notwithstanding the Societies' opposition to leasehold enfranchisement, the memorandum goes on to indicate the Societies' views on the provisions of any legislation providing for leasehold enfranchisement which the Government may decide to introduce.

PARLIAMENTARY QUESTIONS

THE increased cost of this year's Finance Bill is to be questioned in Parliament shortly. Mr Simon Wingfield Digby (Conservative, West Dorset) has tabled a question for the Chancellor of the Exchequer for June 22nd asking why the Stationery Office charge for a copy of the Bill is 14*s* for 226 pages, compared with 6*s* for 104 pages in 1963 and 2*s* 6*d* for 39 pages in 1964. The M.P. wants to know to what extent this increase is due to higher costs and to higher profits, respectively.

Why, when an inquiry is made into the income tax affairs of a taxpayer and nothing is found to be out of order, is the taxpayer called upon to pay the costs of the inquiry? This question is to be put to the Chancellor on June 22nd by Mr William Shepherd (Conservative, Cheadle).

The Chancellor is also being asked whether, under his regulations and the practice of the Revenue, the cost of newspaper advertisements of the texts of speeches of chairmen of public companies can be set off against the companies' income and profits tax, 'even where a large proportion of the speech may be concerned to make political propaganda'. Mr William Hamilton (Labour, West Fife) is to put this query to Mr Callaghan.

The suggestion is being put to the Chancellor that, following the passage of the Finance Bill, he should publish a booklet explaining to taxpayers their obligations.

Also tabled is a question proposing that, in view of the Government's recent commitment to the introduction of metric weights and measures, legislation should now be introduced providing for decimal currency at the earliest possible date.

This is My Life . . .

CHAPTER 281

A YOUNG accountant wrote to us from London asking if by any chance there was an opening for him in our company. He'd been in the City for several years now, in a good position with one of these multi-million industrial giants with international affiliations and they wanted him to take an overseas assignment in Italy. He wasn't keen on the idea. He'd rather stay at home; preferably – if he had to make a change – back here in this town where he grew up.

We didn't have any vacancy, but remembering him as an articled clerk of some distinction some years ago I invited him to come along for a chat. He provided some startling news of working conditions abroad in this field of modern accountancy. Talk about changing times! I felt as wonder struck as Keats's 'watcher of the skies when a new planet swims into his ken'; I wasn't 'with it' at all.

We had been discussing his prospects should he be offered a job hereabouts, and he made some reference to reimbursement of his removal expenses as regards transport of furniture and so on. I said benevolently that I wished him luck. We ourselves on two or three occasions had paid a lump sum to facilitate specially valuable recruits, a procedure which is reasonably normal, but we had never accepted responsibility for the whole cost. The measure of his success would be a yardstick of his bargaining ability. In a burst of confidence I told him that in the two long-gone cases when I personally had changed job and hometown simultaneously, I hadn't had an extra penny from my new employers. As they saw it, it was my problem to put myself in a position to undertake my new duties; any outlay accruing was no concern of theirs. One firm had, however, generously allocated me a carpenter for a day, free of charge, to help with new shelves and a broken gate. I'd had no complaints; that was just how it was in those days.

The accountant's eye gleamed with rather supercilious amusement as he listened. He flicked a speck of dust nonchalantly from his cuff, rather like Town Mouse listening to Country Mouse waffling. His present employers, he indicated gently, were modern and model executives. They didn't expect their staff to be at a monetary loss when moving. Their great hearts throbbed with parental warmth. They would pay all travelling costs to his new base, door to door, for wife and family as well. In addition, they'd increase his basic salary by a disturbance allowance of 12½ per cent. While his duties would be nominally of similar standing while abroad, he'd also receive a further 10 per cent increase for overseas adjustment allowance.

I said rather feebly that, of course, his projected move abroad was at his employers' direct request, so naturally they bore the cost, but I burbled unheard. In addition, he continued, he would be entitled to a cost-of-living notional allowance. This was based on a statistical comparison of major domestic out-of-pockets at home compared with the sunny south. His wife would be invited to comment on its validity. She wouldn't be kept very busy, I gathered, as satisfactory company housing at nominal cost would be available if desired . . . after they all left the hotel where he had a six weeks' entitlement . . . yes, free of charge, naturally.

He glanced round my office. It seemed to have shrunk suddenly; it looked dingy. They'd have a month's annual leave per year, he said; passage paid each way, but perhaps he'd take it in cash instead. After all, with long week-ends in Venice or Capri readily available, why bother to return home?

He'd obviously made his decision at this stage; he had literally talked himself into preferring the foreign job. Looking at the drizzle outside I didn't blame him.

Finance and Commerce

Cash Takings

THE accounts of Currys Ltd have been extended this year to provide more information. The accounts themselves are in precisely the same form as last year but the notes to them are far more informative. In the 1963–64 accounts the only note referred to the fact that capital expenditure commitments amounted to approximately £125,000.

This year, the notes report the surplus on book values shown by a property revaluation made after the end of the financial year, the stock valuation method, more detail than formerly on fixed assets, the depreciation method, a list of wholly-owned subsidiaries and a turnover figure in cash terms.

Sir Nutcombe Hume, the chairman, commenting on the turnover figure, says that as the company sells more than half, by value, of its merchandise on hire-purchase, the board decided that it is more informative to state the cash takings in each financial year rather than the value of sales of which a substantial proportion will come in as cash and profit in future years.

What Currys Sell

It is to be hoped that the property revaluation figure will be kept alive in subsequent accounts and one wonders why the note on capital commitments is kept in splendid isolation in the body of the balance sheet and not included in the general notes to the accounts.

Another point is that the Currys report is made on the assumption that shareholders know what the company does. That is a fair assumption, naturally; but company reports and accounts now have a wider significance and impact and, although it is apparent from a reading of the report that Currys are in the retail trade and do cash as well as hire-purchase and credit business, there is no indication of the area of the retail trade concerned.

The company, in fact, operates some three hundred and forty shops selling cycles, radios, television sets and the necessary accessories and, as the list of subsidiaries shows, owns its own hire-purchase finance, rental and service companies.

Summary

Now that Currys' turnover is given in cash terms, the ten-year review which accompanies the accounts could, with value, be extended to relate profits to turnover. New to the ten-year record this year is the figure for unmatured profit carried forward.

The rest of the record is a summary of the main profit and loss account and balance sheet figures, and the information could be improved not only by relating profits to turnover but also by relating dividends to earnings in terms of dividend cover.

It is always useful to have the profit and asset view taken back over ten years but the record should also be something more than a recital of salient figures. Earnings as a percentage of sales and of employed capital, dividend as a percentage of earnings and other matters of investment importance need to be made to give the record added interest.

The fact that the property revaluation is not to be written into the accounts does not necessarily mean that it need not be written into the ten-year record to show, for example, the true ratio of earnings to true capital worth.

Statistics of Interest

THE directors of Welch, Margetson & Co, manufacturers and distributors of men's wear, acknowledge that the additional record included with the accounts needs to be more than a repetition of balance sheet figures. Their record is headed 'Statistics of Interest' which is precisely what this type of schedule should be.

The statistics show pre-tax profits as a percentage on capital employed, the percentage of earnings attributable to ordinary capital, the percentage rate of dividend paid and the balance sheet value per ordinary share. The figures are headed by total sales of £1,958,708. Capital employed is £969,839 and pre-tax profits £100,483, being a return of 10·4 per cent on employed capital. Equity earnings were 14·5 per cent against an actual dividend of 12 per cent.

Mr A. R. Laurie, O.B.E., C.A., A.C.W.A., in his statement with the accounts, comments that the pre-tax profit expressed as a percentage on sales works out at 4·67 per cent 'which is somewhat modest' and 'much too small a reward for the work done'. Even so, the figure could have been included in the 'Statistics of Interest' rather than in the chairman's statement.

The company is to issue interim financial reports in the future. These will be based on the estimated trading results for the first eight months of each financial year 'which', Mr Laurie says, 'have always been prepared for the purpose of considering the interim ordinary dividend usually paid in December'.

United Biscuits – a Correction

THIS column has to admit to an error of fact when it stated in the issue of May 29th that United Biscuits, in its recently published accounts, had 'provided turnover figures for the first time'.

The company's secretaries point out that 'details of turnover have been incorporated in the accounts of

Notes on the Accounts

Year ended 30th January, 1965 (53 weeks)

1. PROPERTIES

The revaluation carried out by Messrs. Healey & Baker revealed a surplus over book values of £4,317,134 at 19th March, 1965, subject to minor adjustments. It is not proposed to bring this valuation into the Company's accounts.

2. STOCK-IN-TRADE

Valuation is based on current retail prices less a margin to reduce to net cost and to provide for obsolescence and deterioration after eliminating unsaleable lines.

5. SUBSIDIARY COMPANIES (WHOLLY OWNED)

BASINGHALL INDUSTRIAL SERVICES LTD.	— (Finance Company)

8. CAPITAL EXPENDITURE

Group Capital Expenditure Commitments at 30th January, 1965 approximated £100,000.

And, of course, the secretaries are right. Just what prompted this column's statement, to which they naturally take exception, is inexplicable and can only be attributed to a mental aberration which it sincerely regrets. Indeed, United Biscuits must be complimented on having so early set such a good example of enlightened company reporting.

CITY NOTES

WEAKNESS on Wall Street and economic doubts at home continue to combine to plague stock-markets.

The May trade figures were hardly calculated to inspire a return of investment confidence and were translated in some quarters as evidence of a need to turn the credit screw still tighter.

Good industrial company news continues to fall off the stock-market like water off a duck's back. There is more concern with industrial prospects later in the year than with performance even in the recent past.

It is not at all difficult to see reasons for the lack of investment incentive. It is equally difficult to see any early prospect of an improvement in investment conditions.

The swing to the Conservatives shown in the political polls has had a double-edged effect of buoying up hopes of a change in Government but of depressing hopes of an early General Election.

The final round of voluntary amendments to the Finance Bill were well enough received by the market, but the fact that the amendments were necessary has re-emphasized the lack of confidence in the present administration.

* * * *

INDUSTRIAL and Commercial Finance Corporation is expected to be the first City institution to brave the new issue market. Towards the end of this month the Corporation is expected publicly to offer shares in an engineering concern. In the year to last March, I.C.F.C.'s new business figure was a record £17·6 million, business having picked up rapidly in the second half of the year after a slow start.

The flow of high coupon industrial debentures continues with the United Drapery Stores group planning a £10 million operation. There remains a fairly strong institutional appetite for this type of stock provided the terms are right. The May trade figures are considered to have ruled out any early further reduction in Bank rate and industrial refinancing on the present basis of the debenture market is expected to remain active.

INCLUDING £44 million spent on textile company acquisitions, new investment by the Courtaulds group totalled £80 million in the year to last March. Current-year spending on modernization and extension programmes is expected to be of the order of £40 million. Given favourable Government policies towards the cotton industry, Courtaulds plan to spend £15 million over a period of years on their Northern textile division, which mainly comprises the Lancashire Cotton Corporation and Fine Spinners and Doublers.

History of the Institute

From Sir Harold Howitt, G.B.E., D.S.O., M.C., F.C.A.

SIR, – The history of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales and of its founder accountancy bodies, covering the period 1870–1964, is nearing completion, and it is hoped that it may be published about the end of the current year. It would be of interest to include a few illustrations indicative of conditions in the early days of accountancy, e.g.

counting-house or office scenes pictures of premises or office equipment extracts from books or statements of account extracts from articles of clerkship audit or other working records photographs or pictures of interesting groups and dress, etc.

I have been asked by the Council to edit this work, and should be most grateful if any member, or old established firm, would be good enough to send me at the Institute's address – City House, 56/66 Goswell Road, London EC1 – material of this nature appropriate for publication in the history. It would, of course, be kept carefully and returned in due course.

Yours faithfully,

London EC1. H. G. HOWITT.

Current Liabilities – Add or Deduct

SIR, – When creditors or bank overdraft or both are unusually large they will inflate the balance sheet total, if added on the left. (I have heard more than one building society chairman misquote his society's strength for this very reason.) If, however, they are deducted from the assets the net total is nearer 'a true and fair view'.

The balance sheet which you publish on page 560 of your issue dated April 24th, displays a total of £847,207 by grossing up the liabilities on the left whereas if deducted from the assets on the right – surely 'truer and fairer' – the net worth would appear as £335,504. This would be comparable with the sum of £320,562 at the end of the previous year. The apparent rise on the assets side by £286,200 to £847,207 is meaningless.

Will some patient friend kindly explain in your columns why the older method is still used in a balance sheet which ought to be a model for us all?

Yours faithfully,

AUSTEN SPEARING,
Financial Secretary,
London SW1. LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

The Finance (No. 2) Bill

SIR, – When William Shakespeare headed a deputation to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the proceedings made so deep an impression upon him that they may be traced in his published works, as the appended record shows.

Yours faithfully,

Bridlington. J. C. BEAUVAIS.

Taxation Cases

Full reports of the cases summarized in this column will be published, with Notes on the Judgments, in the 'Annotated Tax Cases'.

British South Africa Company v. Varty

(Before Lord MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST, Lord HODSON, Lord GUEST, Lord DONOVAN and Lord PEARSON)

Income tax – Loan to company – Option to subscribe for shares – Allotment accordingly – Surplus of market value over option value – Whether taxable receipt – Income Tax Act, 1952, section 123 (Schedule D).

In 1952 Anglo-American Corporation Ltd agreed to provide President Steyn Gold Mining Co Ltd with loan facilities up to £4 million, and interest was payable by the borrower on amounts drawn. Not less than £2 million of the loan was to be repaid by the end of 1957, and the balance by the end of 1962. As consideration for these facilities Anglo-American was to have a raising fee, and an option, exercisable before June 30th, 1955, to subscribe for two million shares in the President Steyn company at a price of 20*s* a share. To the extent to which Anglo-American exercised this option and subscribed for the shares, the loan facilities were to be reduced. At any time after June 30th, 1955, Anglo-American could call on the President Steyn company to issue unsecured notes for the outstanding amount of the loan and to apply for quotations on the London and Johannesburg Stock Exchanges.

In the same year, 1952, Anglo-American granted to the appellant company a 5 per cent participation in these arrangements, and thus the appellant company committed itself to provide the President Steyn company with loan facilities up to £200,000 and also received an option to subscribe for 100,000 shares in that company at 20*s* a share. In 1954 the respondent exercised its option and was allotted the 100,000 shares in the President Steyn company. These shares were then worth 43*s* 6*d* each, so that the respondent obtained a book surplus of £117,500.

It was contended by the respondent (i) that the acquisition and exercise of the option was a dealing in the option in the course of the respondent's trade, and that the £117,500, was a profit from that dealing, (ii) alternatively, on the exercise of the option one item of the appellant's trading stock, the loan of £100,000 owing by the President Steyn company, was converted into or exchanged for shares in that company, and this conversion or exchange was a realization of the loan and gave rise to a taxable profit of £117,500. The Special Commissioners decided in favour of the appellant.

Held (reversing the decision of the Court of Appeal, Lord Justice Danckwerts dissenting): the option was not realized in such a way as to produce a profit and there was no liability to tax in respect of its exercise.

Cyril Lord Limited v. C.I.R.

(Before Lord REID, Lord HODSON, Lord GUEST, Lord UPJOHN and Lord PEARSON)

Excess profits levy – Valuation of trading stock – Stock written down at end of previous account period – Increase of value in next accounting period – Whether profit of that period to be calculated at cost or written-down value – Whether income tax calculation to be followed – Finance (No. 2) Act, 1915, Schedule IV, Part I, paragraph 1 – Finance Act, 1937, section 20 (1), Schedule 4 – Finance Act, 1952, section 45 (1), Schedule 9.

The appellant company carried on business as a textile manufacturer and merchant. During 1951 there was a slump in its trade, and the trading stock was written down in the company's accounts at December 31st, 1951, from cost price, £543,530, to its then market value, £103,487. The assessments to income tax and profits tax based on the accounts for the period to December 31st, 1951, and onwards were computed on the written-down value at December 31st, 1951. During 1952, the company's trade improved greatly, and it sold a large part of its trading stock at more than the written-down value. The written-down value of the stock sold in the chargeable accounting periods ended on December 31st, 1952, and November 30th, 1953, was £50,583 and the cost was £456,344, In accounts for those periods for income tax and profits tax purposes the profit was calculated by taking the difference between the written-down value of the stock sold and the amounts for which it was sold.

The company appealed against assessments to excess profits levy for the chargeable accounting periods ended December 31st, 1952, and November 30th, 1953, and contended that it was entitled, in computing its profits for those chargeable accounting periods, to commence with the stock at cost price. It was contended for the respondents that the stock should be brought in at the written-down value that had been adopted for income tax. The Additional Recorder of Belfast decided in favour of the respondents.

Held (affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal of Northern Ireland): that the Additional Recorder's decision was correct.

THE INSTITUTE OF MUNICIPAL TREASURERS AND ACCOUNTANTS

EIGHTIETH ANNUAL CONFERENCE

SOME sixteen hundred members and delegates attended the eightieth annual conference of The Institute of Municipal Treasurers and Accountants held at Eastbourne on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday of last week.

Following the official opening of the conference on Wednesday morning, consideration was given to the annual report of the Council and the retiring President of the Institute, Mr Ian M. Cowan, M.B.E., F.S.A.A., F.I.M.T.A., Borough Treasurer of Eastbourne, then delivered his presidential address. In the afternoon, Mr John Ruscoe, M.A., B.COM., F.I.M.T.A., Treasurer of the City of Bradford, delivered a paper on 'Housing'.

Other papers were delivered on 'Some administrative problems of local government', by Sir William Hart, C.M.G., Clerk to the Greater London Council, on Thursday morning, and by Mr Russell J. Clark, Economic Adviser, Westminster Bank Ltd, on 'Finance in the public sector' on Friday morning.

Also on Friday, as referred to in a 'Weekly Note' elsewhere in this issue, the investiture of the new President took place.

Extracts from the Report of the Council

Local Government Finance

Over the past year or so, concern has been expressed over the apparently accelerating increase, not only of local government expenditure, but of public service expenditure as a whole, which seems inevitably destined to absorb an increasing proportion of the gross national product if the development plans of successive Governments are to be implemented and unless national productivity increases at a faster rate than recent experience suggests that it is likely to.

This is a national problem. The trend of public expenditure is determined to a very great extent by public demand for the expansion of services from which it would be reasonable to assume a national willingness to spend an increasing proportion of the national income collectively. Both central and local government are virtually committed to the satisfaction of the public demand and thus local authorities are faced with the problem of raising from the ratepayers continually increasing amounts.

The advantages and defects of the rating system are frequently argued, but it can be said that its principal defect as a tax base at the present time is that it is relatively inflexible, that is, the taxable capacity of the ratepayer (or of some classes of ratepayer) does not rise as rapidly as does expenditure.

In this situation there are only four ways of relieving the burden of rates as a whole:

(a) The rise in expenditure might be reduced or contained.
(b) The national Exchequer might bear a larger proportion of local government expenditure.
(c) Local authorities might be given additional taxing powers so that they have a greater measure of flexibility.
(d) Additional income might be obtained from charges for services.

A general view of the platform at the opening session.

Nothing further need be said about the first of these possibilities (which are not, of course, simple alternatives). This is a matter of major national policy, outside the province of the Institute.

It is well known, however, that the Government are in the process of undertaking a major review of local government finance which will take into account the question of increasing Government grants (and possibly amending the method of distribution), as well as the possibility of adding to the taxing powers of local authorities or amending the rating system. Connected with this is the review of housing finance, and, of course, the Government will have available the results of the Allen Committee inquiry into the impact of rates.

Grants

During the past year the negotiations over the general grant for the years 1965–66 and 1966–67 took place. The general grant is paid to the councils of counties and county boroughs in England and Wales and to counties and large burghs in Scotland, and although it is a grant in aid of local government services generally its total amount is fixed by reference to estimated expenditure on certain specified services and is determined every two years for a period two years ahead. The grant as revised from time to time since its inception in 1959–60 has been as follows:

	England and Wales		Scotland
	Relevant Expenditure	Grant	Relevant Expenditure	Grant
	£m	£m	£m	£m
1959–60	723	402	82	51
1960–61	770	429	87	54
1961–62	847	472	96	59
1962–63	930	519	101	62
1963–64	1,051	587	118	71
1964–65	1,116	625	123	74
1965–66	1,246	680	132	81
1966–67	1,339	731	140	85

During the recent negotiations the local authority representatives expressed some dissatisfaction on certain points of principle. One point which was argued strongly was that in considering the local authority estimates the Departments should take into account the relationship in past years between the final outturn of expenditure and the estimates on which the grants for those years were based. The grant for a particular year can only be varied by an Increase Order to take account of increases in the levels of wages and prices, and it was felt by the local authorities that it would be fairer, as well as simpler, if the grant could be based on the principle of taking one year with another.

The local authority treasurers also emphasized the tendency for the forecasts to be under-estimated by the local authorities themselves in the second year of each grant period and in the Grant Orders provision was made for 1966–67 of sums of £20 million for England and Wales and £2 million for Scotland not allocated to any services to cover under-estimating and unforeseen development of service. But the Government clearly did not accept the other arguments put forward by the Associations and would not restore cuts in the forecasts made by the Departments during the negotiation.

The Minister, in submitting the Order to Parliament, confirmed the Government's intention either to abandon the general grant or to amend its basis substantially. Although there is probably no consensus of opinion, many people in local government, including some who expressed forebodings when the grant was first introduced, now feel that the principle of the grant is sound, but that a greater degree of sophistication could be applied to the method of calculation and distribution.

Rating

Following the revaluation of 1963, the then Government appointed a Committee of Enquiry under the Chairmanship of Professor R. G. D. Allen, C.B.E., 'to assess the impact of rates on householders in different parts of Great Britain with special regard to any circumstances likely to give rise to hardship'.

The report of the Allen Committee was published in February 1965. It presents an impressive array of factual information about the impact of rates on households of different income groups and in different regions, and cannot fail to be of immense value in any review of the rating system. The Committee did not, however, consider it within their terms of reference to pass judgment on the rating system.

The Committee reached some significant conclusions:

(a) Domestic rates are less now than before the last war, as a proportion of all local authority expenditure, or of all personal incomes, or of total taxes. The proportion, however, has been rising in recent years.
(b) The revaluation of 1963 introduced consistency, although there were gainers and losers.
(c) The groups who fared worst from the revaluation were the occupiers of modern dwellings and householders in London.
(d) Rates are regressive in their impact on one-person and two-person households.
(e) About five hundred thousand households with retired heads are apparently eligible for national assistance but not getting it.
(f) There is some evidence of substantial under-occupation among retired households.

The Allen Committee did not attempt to define hardship, which is a relative and subjective concept, but it is clear from the data that some hardship does arise within a narrow band of ratepayers who are faced with meeting steadily increasing rate bills out of fixed incomes. So far as it is not covered by increased national assistance payment, this hardship could be alleviated by some form of rate rebate scheme on the lines of an extension of the provisions of the Rating (Interim Relief) Act.

Recruitment and Training

The Institute's evidence to the Committees on People in Local Government placed emphasis on the need for local government to attract officers of high calibre.

The Institute believes that local authorities and their associations should assume a much greater role in recruiting and training officers than they have in the past. Nevertheless, the professional associations themselves must continue to develop their role in training staff to appropriate professional standards.

Whatever the source of recruitment, the Institute thinks that arrangements should be made to ensure that potential trainee accountants can be afforded systematic training facilities leading to the attainment of professional status including:

(a) Early opportunity to register as a trainee with the professional body.

(b) The opportunity and encouragement to attend suitable training courses.

(c) An adequate range of professional experience.

The Council has opened discussions with the Joint Committee of Students Societies and with the Department of Education and Science with a view to developing arrangements for the co-ordination of the establishment of courses for I.M.T.A. students at Colleges of Further Education.

Computers

In the last annual report reference was made to the proposed formation of the Institute's 'Local and Public Authority Computer Panel' which was set up during the year with the ready co-operation of the Society of County Treasurers, with the following terms of reference:

(i) the appraisal and development of new procedures and systems which may be of benefit to a number of authorities and boards;

(ii) co-operation with other professional and technical organizations in developing the use of computers (e.g. Bills of Quantities for Consortia, Traffic Surveys, Census, and other basic statistical information);

(iii) constant review of different forms of co-operation;

(iv) maintenance of an index of computer applications developed or being developed by local authorities and boards;

(v) assessment of data processing equipment and services available to local and public authorities.

The work of the panel is co-ordinated by Mr J. B. Woodham, Borough Treasurer, Middlesbrough, and Mr C. W. Mallinson, County Treasurer, West Sussex. The Chairman is Mr J. E. Tinker, Deputy County Treasurer, Cheshire.

The panel has had a most active year. It has arranged several meetings with representatives of the Banks and Central Government Departments to establish links in order to achieve the maximum possible co-ordination of computer developments in which the different agencies have some common interest. The panel has also established a series of working parties to investigate a number of projects.

Presidential Address

In the course of his address to the conference, the retiring President, Mr Ian M. Cowan, M.B.E., F.S.A.A., F.I.M.T.A., Borough Treasurer of Eastbourne, said:

In the provision and administration of services, local government is concerned with those which are of particular interest and benefit to the locality and also those which are of a quasi national character; the development of all these services reflects a more enlightened public opinion, and in the case of the major services (e.g. education, health, welfare, highways and planning) is the consequence of the requirements of Parliament. Commitments involving many years to come have had to be entered into, the pressure is such that priorities are seldom a matter of unrestricted choice and the responsibility and the expenditure involved grows and will continue to grow. Local government is now spending something like 10 per cent of the gross national product or £2,800 million per annum.

One cannot help reflecting that as a nation and as individual local authorities we may be seeking to do too much in too many fields in too short a time, thereby aggravating the problems with which we have to contend because the cumulative result involves an ever increasing cost which does not have sufficient regard to the nation's resources and earning performance.

Local authorities are keenly aware of the need for improved services but they are also aware of restrictions and controls many of which are exercised by the Government, and necessarily so, because of the obvious limitations in the nation's resources as evidenced by the shortages of manpower and the balance of international payments. Even so considerable developments have been possible which, coupled with the effects of inflation, have led to rate increases and a considerable volume of criticism both of the amount and the system of local taxation. This criticism extends not only to rating but also to the structure of the grant system, under which a substantial part of local expenditure is syphoned off to be met by the national exchequer, and to the unsuitability of local government boundaries and the distribution of functions among authorities.

In this situation there is the need for a clear understanding of the issues involved and whilst some of these can only be dealt with by our political masters in Westminster we must see that our sights are lifted above the somewhat narrowing confines of local loyalties and responsibilities. One thing, however, stands out clearly as being not only within our decision but also and unquestionably within our responsibility and that is to seek decisive improvements in the efficiency and economy of financial management. This is of supreme and fundamental importance and therefore in the administration of the services with which we are concerned we cannot avoid taking the long hard look at ourselves in the same way as industry and commerce is currently being expected to do.

We must recognize the necessity, in circumstances which are always changing in local government, constantly to improve the efficiency of financial management. The responsibilities and problems would be great enough if they were having to be faced in an economy which ran smoothly and was free from crises and continuing inflation. But alas this is not so. Quite apart from the frustration which is experienced and the disturbing effect on long-term planning, there is inevitably a continuing spiral of rising costs due to inflationary conditions, whilst interest rates have reacted to Bank rate which has been hoisted too frequently for the peace of mind of local treasuries.

Dickerson Report

The Institute, conscious of its responsibilities, commissioned Mr R. W. V. Dickerson to undertake a research study into the recruitment and training of staff in the finance department of local authorities. A very strong steering committee was established representative of the academic and professional spheres and Mr Dickerson's report has now been published. Among the principal reasons which influenced the Council when this training research was undertaken were the changes in the pattern of education and the need to review entry requirements and the channel of recruitment to conform to the higher demands of the service, the development of new training methods (particularly oral tuition and the introduction of block training and sandwich courses), and also the changes in the structure of local government and the development of techniques which will result in changes in the functions and duties of finance officers. Regard has been had to the need where possible to co-ordinate and rationalize training arrangements, particularly with other professional organizations, and also to develop a closer relationship with the universities. There is every reason to believe that the Institute has an important part to play in this connection and should not delay in taking the initiative or participating in the leadership which is so essential.

Not only should we aim to recruit and train men of the right calibre for the advanced professional work but we should achieve the most effective and efficient use of such staff, realizing that standards must be advanced to cater for the higher responsibilities of today and tomorrow. These problems call for considerable reappraisal: it is not proposed here to attempt to comment in detail but rather to emphasize that the Institute Council is concerned to facilitate examination of these matters. But in saying that it must also be appreciated that local government in general will undoubtedly have to accept a greater measure of responsibility in the future for training. The problems to be faced will not be easy of solution but inevitably they indicate the need for substantially improved administration and management teaching facilities. A local government staff college is one of the great needs but not the only one. The responsibility of providing these facilities falls, and must fall, on local government, that is local authorities acting in their corporate capacities through their respective associations.

Impact of the Computer

Improvement in accounting techniques most assuredly extends to include wider services in the form of inter-departmental co-operation. The treasury function of the finance department will inevitably require that the major use of computers will be in the finance department, and that the necessary expertise must be acquired by the responsible members of the staffs in that department. This leads one to offer some comments upon the impact of the computer which after all is not only a vital part of the equipment of accounting and control but also is a tool of management. A full understanding of the mechanical side of its mysteries is, of course, essential to efficient operation but it is equally important that there should be a full understanding of the potential and possibilities of this type of equipment which offers considerable scope for accounting work and data processing both inside and outside the finance department. Sound financial advice and proper decisions will only be achieved after weighing all the relevant factors, many of which may not, in a less sophisticated age, ever have been collated, quantified and classified.

Responsibilies of the Chief Financial Officer

The managerial function of the chief financial officer will be exercised to a much greater extent but it will be appreciated that his responsibilities and services do not extend to any attempt to override the primary responsibilities of other heads of departments. There must, however, be an increased involvement in the work of other departments and whilst the financial officer's basic responsibilities will never be lessened in respect of security and efficiency he must be prepared to take advantage, and the training arrangements in his department must take account of, the new opportunities of the age into which we have entered. The problems of the smaller authorities may well be acute and the advantages, which are possible for the larger and medium authorities, will be difficult of achievement, but there are clearly opportunities for inter-authority co-operation and assistance. These considerations reflect the importance of a proper understanding of the needs of the various departments of a local authority and of the maintenance and efficient development of the wide range of services of different types and sizes: this

Whilst members can contribute greatly to operational efficiency, in many ways efficiency in the last resort means people – people on the job, for it is their calibre and their attitude to their work that counts. If they can be well chosen, properly qualified, inspired by a common purpose, given the right experience and training and assisted in the development of their judgement then they can be trusted to do what is required of them. The contribution which we can make as individuals and as an Institute to that end is both one of the greatest responsibilities and also the most challenging of opportunities with which we are faced today.

Papers Presented at the Conference

Housing Needs a New Approach

In an address on 'Housing', Mr John Ruscoe, M.A., B.COM., F.I.M.T.A., Treasurer of the City of Bradford, examined the growth of the general acceptance of public responsibility for the building of a sufficiency of suitable dwellings to house the nation's families, and went on to examine some of the difficulties encountered in finding a solution to a pressing social problem. He warned his audience that the public systems of social service, despite their aim, had the effect of enlarging the range of social inequality.

Mr John Ruscoe

The Minister had recently asked local authorities to submit housing programmes for the next four years, and to review housing needs from the comprehensive angle of overall shortage. In order to do this it was necessary to have reasoned assumptions about all the elements which make up housing need – adequacy of the existing stock, population growth and household formation, continuing deterioration and population movements. Statistics which gave the impression that if households were only to be reshuffled the housing problem would be solved were not really convincing.

Mr Ruscoe stated that any large increase in publicly sponsored construction should cater for the old, the widowed, and the single – the only groups in which a considerable proportion did not already have suitable homes of their own.

Renovation and industrialization had often been mentioned as the key to the housing shortage, but renovation could prove to be a very expensive escape route, and even if by prefabrication, houses could be built faster, it was doubtful whether they could be built more cheaply.

On rents, Mr Ruscoe said that it was certain that many council tenants could pay higher rents. In every income bracket except the very highest, upwards of one-fifth of the households were found in council housing. Moreover 39 per cent of households had two or more earners and the figure might be higher in the case of local authority households.

But, without a subsidy, no recently constructed flat in a multi-storeyed block was a renting proposition on a cost basis to the lower and lower middle income groups, compared with the alternative proposition of owner occupation with tax relief thrown in. If rough equity was to be achieved, subsidies must continue, but their distribution could be bettered.

'Rents must of necessity go up' said Mr Ruscoe, but the acid test for any housing programme should be whether it gives assistance to those who were most deprived.

Will the Town Hall Survive?

'Is local government a passing phase in British political evolution?' This was the question posed by Sir William Hart, C.M.G., Clerk to the Greater London Council, in an address on 'Some administrative problems of local government'.

Local government as we know it today, said Sir William, developed from the nineteenth century's interest in democracy, but there had recently been a tendency for services to be transferred from small to large authorities, if not from local government altogether.

Sir William Hart

A local authority had to administer diverse services over one area. The best area for one service was not necessarily the best for another. The attractions of the one-purpose authority were apparent, but the nineteenth century showed the confusion which a series of such authorities could cause. In fact, with the development of central control, the tendency had been to establish not an elected authority but an appointed board like those for the hospital service and the gas and electricity industries.

Other factors which had weakened local self-government included the growing cost of maintaining services, the restricting scope of rates, the disproportionate reliance on Government grants, and the consequent increase in the financial participation and of control by the Government. This could lead to the conversion of local authorities into local agents for carrying out national policy.

Sir William stated that at a time when local government was so progressive in the use of computers and modern management techniques, and when it made so big an impact on the national financial and employment picture, it was absurd that it should so often evoke an ignorant, but ready, image of bumbledom and pettifogging extravagance. But certain traditional elements in the local government system had tended to work against local government reforms and had fostered the impression of the parish pump as the symbol of local government, and the opinion that no man worth his salt would want to be a local government officer.

There was a need for another look at departmental organization; the relationship of the officers and the departments; and the co-ordination and chain of command between them. Such problems as urban renewal and town development called for inter-departmental teams. These teams needed strong individual leadership and if there were to be larger local government areas, there must be more emphasis on management.

Sir William concluded by looking forward to changes in the scale and scope of public services. The principle of the elected amateur controlling the permanent experts by his personal knowledge of constituencies and constituents might no longer be possible, because with larger and more complex local authorities, the burden on members who tried to deal with details became intolerable. We might see the development of a Cabinet system or a paid board in local government.

The structure of the administrative machine must be clear and efficient. The limits of delegation must be defined accurately. The choice was between local democracy surviving in the context of what might be regarded as regional rather than local government; and a further development of appointed boards responsible to popular feeling only through appointed advisory or consultative committees or the remote Parliamentary responsibility of a Minister.

Financing the Public Sector

The importance of the public sector had increased – regardless of the complexion of the Government – was increasing and, some would add, ought to be diminished, said Mr Russell J. Clark, Economic Adviser to the Westminster Bank, in his address to the conference.

Mr Russell J. Clark

Mr Clark himself, however, did not advocate a diminution, though he hoped the size of the public sector would never be taken for granted.

In a mixed economy, public and private sectors shared the same limited resources. The public sector's share was, in fact, pre-empted, and Government finance must secure a proper balance between the two sectors. Mr Clark stressed that the public sector, as far as financing goes, is one and indivisible: the artificial distinction between central and local government finance had harmful results – two lots of taxation; the tendency of local authorities to think in terms of 'raising money to pay for this or that' instead of in terms of the supply and demand of real resources; and the complication of the central government's task of overall management.

The Department of Economic Affairs should find a major function in overcoming this piecemeal approach to public expenditure. It should, for example, be able to avoid any waste of resources which could be caused by competition between the nationalized power industries.

Mr Clark went on to mention the new regional machinery set up by the Department of Economic Affairs. This might provide a direct and swift way of bringing local problems to the attention of the central government. He next discussed the finance of the public sector. Nationalized industries, while left to run their current affairs in moderate independence, had increasingly been able to rely on the central government for their capital needs. Local authorities had been more closely controlled and, moreover, had received little Government help towards their capital requirements.

With the growth of local authority short-term borrowing, the central government was faced with the creation of a large volume of short-term debt which was largely insensitive to interest rate policy. As a result, the Government had taken measures to put things on a more stable footing by restoring some access to the Public Works Loan Board and by imposing a statutory limitation on temporary borrowing.

Mr Clark then turned to consider possible changes in the methods of financing local services. It might seem attractive to combine a local income tax with the establishment of regional economic development councils. But in practice the underdeveloped regions would have low resources and greater needs, so that some kind of 'deficiency payment' would be necessary.

Over the last century, piecemeal action had been taken to mitigate the vigours of a free economy. The price mechanism, in Mr Clark's view, was the right regulator for the private sector, but this would not work in the public sector, where demand was not responsive to supply. Now that the public sector absorbed 40 per cent of the gross national product, the Government, which decrees the 'end', by legislative fiat, must will the 'means' by providing the necessary finance through central channels.

The Radcliffe Committee had suggested that local authorities should use the banks for purely temporary and irregular borrowing, paying a rate between that charged to industrial borrowers and the Treasury Bill rate. Mr Clark did not wholly agree: local authorities' needs, as far as the banks were concerned, were often most pressing when money was tight, and the banks' liquid resources could be more profitably employed elsewhere.

Mr Clark concluded: 'The plain fact is that, if the public sector is to spend 40 per cent of the gross national product, the rest of the economy must make do with 60 per cent. My contention is that the monetary side of this allocation of resources would be made vastly simpler if we treated the public sector as a single whole.'

ACCOUNTING MACHINE EXHIBITION

Many of those attending the conference visited a private exhibition of accounting equipment specially arranged for the duration of the conference by Logabax Ltd. The exhibition included practical demonstrations of both Logabax and Siemag machines. The Logabax statistical analysis machine is already used in the finance departments of a number of local authorities for dealing with the preparation of rate demands, the balancing of accounts in connection with mortgage repayments, and the analysis of expenditure.

OBITUARY

H. A. R. J. Wilson, F.C.A.

As briefly announced in last week's issue, it was with deep regret that we learned of the death on June 9th of Mr H. A. R. J. Wilson, F.C.A., who was in his sixty-eighth year. Until his retirement last August due to ill health, Mr Wilson had been a senior partner of Wilson, Bigg & Co, Chartered Accountants, of London, and up to the time of his death was a director of H. Foulks Lynch & Co Ltd, the well-known accountancy tutors.

Mr Wilson was educated at Tadcaster Grammar School and at Dumfries Academy. In July 1916, he joined the forces and served with the Gordon Highlanders until October 1919. In November 1920 he was articled to H. F. Inkson, of Palmer, Haines, Inkson & Co, of London, and in 1924 was admitted to membership of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales. He became a founder member of the firm of Taylor, Allen, Bigg & Co, the former name of Wilson, Bigg & Co, in 1926.

In 1928 Mr Wilson, with Mr W. W. Bigg, F.C.A., acquired control of H. Foulks Lynch & Co Ltd – which had been founded in 1884 – and remained a director of the company for thirty-seven years, during which time pupils of the company on several occasions won all the Honours in the Final and Intermediate examinations of the Institute. Mr Wilson was the author of many well-known textbooks and also revised the standard works of Messrs Spicer and Pegler, from whom, with Mr Bigg, he had taken over control of H. Foulks Lynch. A large number of accountants will also remember him as a lecturer.

In the Second World War he devoted a considerable amount of time and energy to the Home Guard and became a Battalion Commander with the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel.

With the end of the war Mr Wilson was able to devote more time to masonic work and in 1951 became Grand Treasurer of the United Grand Lodge of England, and later a member of the Board of General Purposes. He was also a member of the Board of Management of the

We've often been called the 'liveliest wire in the building society world'. To earn a title like that takes years. But we worked at it. Thought ahead. Took progressive steps. Looked after our investors. And in the last ten years we've watched our assets multiply more than three-fold whilst the number of accounts has nearly doubled. In the next ten years we'll probably repeat the performance—and more! Because now, with the help of a super-efficient computer and a new administration centre, we've opened up the future. We could grow up to four times our present size and still cope easily with the expansion. Try testing us—with your investment.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF MANAGEMENT ACCOUNTS IN PRACTICE

by A. G. B. BURNEY, O.B.E., B.A., F.C.A.

PART A of this book explains a number of management accounting statements designed to assist various levels of management in controlling their costs. Part B describes the detailed costing and accounting procedures which enable the statements for a medium-size manufacturing concern to be prepared.

The emphasis is on practical management accounts, inasmuch as all the statements were designed for the everyday use of the managements concerned.

It is possible in this book to study a complete system of management accounting starting with the setting up of the necessary standard costs and budgets. The entries in the costing and accounting records are also shown together with the statements for top management, departmental managers and foremen. The system shows that the costing and financial accounts are integrated and reconciled.

Students should find this book useful reading for their examinations as it shows how theory and principles are applied in practice. Accountants in industry, whether they have experience of management accounting or not, should derive benefit from the experience of others.

As a practising accountant, the author has advised a number of businesses wishing to establish systems of management accounting. His experience in this field will be of interest to other practising accountants who are being increasingly called upon to assist their clients in this way.

Those responsible for providing training and experience for accountants will be interested in the author's view that accountants should become more closely associated with the problems of departmental managers and shop foremen as well as those of top management if they are to satisfy the needs of all levels of management for cost control information.

This book is therefore recommended reading for the growing body of students, accountants and managements who would like to become more familiar with practical management accounts.

THREE SPECIFIC PARTNERSHIP APPOINTMENTS

Owing to continuous and persistently increasing tempo of expansion, a professional firm (eleven partners) whose practice embraces a large-scale diversity of professional services urgently requires to relieve pressure on certain of the partners by immediate reinforcement of staff at manager/potential partner level as follows:

VACANCY A – INSOLVENCY ADMINISTRATION

Specialized competence which is fully adequate to head an insolvency department is imperative. Qualification other than as a chartered accountant will not debar from partner prospects.

VACANCY B – TAXATION

Management capacity and taxation competence adequate to lift the strain from a partner is the major criterion. Chartered accountant qualification is not essential.

VACANCY C – COMPANY SECRETARIAL DEPARTMENT

A degree of specialized experience adequate to immediately assume 'No. 1' responsibilities is required.

Each of the above vacancies offers:
(a) a top current rate salary negotiable in accordance with the responsibilities to be undertaken.
(b) the definite prospect of salaried partner status as soon as competence and ability to work on own initiative at partner level is proven.
(c) in due course, an opportunity to become a profit-sharing partner.

ESTATE DUTIES INVESTMENT TRUST

Decade of Progress

Lord Piercy

The thirteenth Annual General Meeting of Estate Duties Investment Trust Limited was held on June 18th in London, The Rt Hon. Lord Piercy, C.B.E. (the Chairman), presiding.

The following is from his circulated statement:

The year was an active one, resulting in a net increase in investments of £682,513. Total investments at March 31st, 1965, stood at £4,426,973, comparing with £3,744,460 a year previously. Further commitments were £347,965 compared with £414,264 a year ago. As usual, a certain amount of business was placed with some of our Institutional Shareholders. The market value of quoted investments at the year end was £2,102,252, comparing with £1,908,332.

Income for the year, after expenses but before tax, amounted to £422,497, which compares with £358,153 for 1963–64. Allowing for tax, and adding the carry-forward from last year, the amount available for distribution was £602,380. An interim dividend of 4 per cent was paid in December 1964, and the directors recommend the payment of a final dividend of 6 per cent. The total dividend of 10 per cent on the present Share Capital of £3 million compares with last year's figure of 10 per cent on the then issued capital of £2,600,000, equivalent to 8·66 per cent on the present issued capital.

If the final dividend is approved, the Surplus carried forward on Revenue Account will be £423,130. Revenue Surplus and Capital Surplus (£387,453) together will amount to £810,583. It is proposed to utilize £500,000 of these reserves for the issue of 500,000 new Shares of £1 each to be allotted credited as fully paid to the shareholders in the proportion of one new Share of £1 for every six Shares of £1 held on May 15th, 1965, subject to the approval of shareholders at the Annual General Meeting.

THE FINANCE BILL

At the time of writing these observations, the Finance Bill of 226 pages and White Papers on the Corporation Tax and Taxation of Capital Gains have become available to a worried and perplexed business community. Much abstruse discussion obviously lies ahead as the Bill makes its passage.

These projects, if they become law, will add to the prospective terrors of estate duty. It becomes the more desirable for persons interested as shareholders in private business, especially in a family business, to contemplate in good time the making of provisions to cover the possible liability, and to mitigate the effects on the management and the continuity of the undertaking.

Graduate Articled Clerks Survey

ONLY one clerk out of every ten who become articled to a member of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales is a university graduate. Of the graduates who enter into articles, however, about 85 per cent qualify as against 60–65 per cent of the non-graduate starters. Accordingly, the number of graduates who become members constitutes about 12–16 per cent of the total. In recent years rather more than 40 per cent of the graduates attracted to the profession came from Oxford or Cambridge and another 13 per cent from London. Only about 2 per cent of the total had first-class honours degrees although approximately another 12 per cent had good seconds. Nearly half of all graduates who became articled were introduced by relatives and friends. The recruiting efforts of the Institute and the services of university appointments boards accounted for one-third.

These facts and many others are assembled in a report, recently published, based on a survey of the experiences of graduate articled clerks from 1952 to 1963, compiled by a small group of appointment officers from the universities of Durham, Manchester and Nottingham with statistical and other help from the Institute.[1] Commendably, 80·7 per cent of the 2,326 graduates to whom questionnaires were sent responded. With such a degree of co-operation it is reasonable to assume that the facts and figures are representative of the period covered by the survey, particularly as in no single year did the response rate fall below 70 per cent.

In 1952, the first year of the survey, the intake of graduate articled clerks was 132 and in 1963 it was 318. The peak years were 1959 and 1960. Since then, despite a greater output of graduates and much improved salary prospects in the profession, recruitment has fallen off. London continues to attract about 60 per cent of all entrants and of these about one-third go to one or other of seven major firms. The range of practical experience obtained varies, understandably, with the size of the firm but, even in the smallest, one-third of the articled clerks in the 1960–63 segment had had experience of mechanized accounts. Those in the largest offices fared best, 78 per cent being acquainted with mechanized accounts, 57 per cent with cost accounting systems, 37 per cent with standard costing and 33 per cent with computer techniques.

The chief criticism of their training, voiced by about 30 per cent of all graduate clerks, was that principals should take more interest in their pupils' progress. Twenty-five per cent would have preferred less routine work, 22 per cent more study leave and 15 per cent more money. Starting salaries in London rose from £201–£250 in 1954 to £401–£450 in 1963. Provincial levels were about £100 lower. Returns showed that 48 per cent of all graduates were earning not more than £1,000 per annum on qualification. After qualifying, however, graduates appear to make good financial progress although those migrating to industry do only marginally better than those who remain in the profession.

What conclusions may be drawn from these and many more admirably presented statistics? To begin with, the compilers suggest that the Institute, to attract more graduate articled clerks, should exhort its members to pay sufficiently large salaries to make such entrants independent of parental support. This would not be a form of charity as 85 per cent of the men in their third year claim that more than 75 per cent of the work they did for their firm was 'productive'. Secondly, the survey shows that the larger the firm the better may be the training expected. It would seem, therefore, that the Institute must encourage an even greater concentration in this direction than is indicated by the fact that firms with upwards of ten partners at present absorb nearly half the graduate articled clerks recruited.

Again, the report strongly recommends that the Institute should take more positive steps to ensure that principals provide adequate all-round training (this may involve secondment to other firms or to industry) and arrange that theoretical study and practical experience are properly integrated. Indeed, so critical are the compilers, on the strength of the impressive evidence accumulated, that they go so far as to say that the whole concept of articled service requires to be re-examined.

CAPITAL GAINS TAX

Assets and Disposals

CAPITAL gains tax is imposed by clause 18 (1) of the Finance Bill on capital gains 'accruing to a person on the disposal of assets'. This prompts two questions. What are assets? and, what is a disposal? For the answers, one must turn first to clause 21. This declares that 'all forms of property' shall be assets for the purposes of Part III of the Bill; a typical example of trying to explain a simple word by means of a more complicated one. The addition of the words 'whether situated in the United Kingdom or not' does not mean that the asset need be a tangible one. Clause 39 (4) constitutes a code for determining where certain kinds of assets are to be treated as situate for Part III purposes, and these assets include intangible ones. Moreover, clause 21 (1) expressly includes the following as 'assets':

(a) options, debts and incorporeal property generally, and
(b) any currency other than sterling, and
(c) any form of property created by the person disposing of it, or otherwise coming to be owned without being acquired.

Decisions under the Stamp Duty Acts imposing duty on conveyances of 'property' are perhaps useful in this context. However, they must be read subject to clause 21 (3) which in effect widens the meaning of 'assets'. It does so by giving an extended definition of the phrase 'disposal of assets' and therefore one should first examine paragraph (a) of clause 21 (2), which says that references in Part III to a disposal of an asset include references to a part disposal of an asset, except where the context otherwise requires.

'Disposal' by itself is not defined. According to paragraph (b) there is a part disposal of an asset where an interest or right in or over the asset is created by the [sic] disposal. The paragraph adds that 'generally' there is a part disposal of an asset where, on a person making a disposal, any description of property derived from the asset remains undisposed of. Why should clause 21 (2) (b) attach the specific label 'part disposal' to a transaction, instead of calling it a disposal? The answer seems to lie mainly in paragraph 7 of Schedule 6 which is headed 'Part disposals' and provides for the apportionment of costs between the part that is disposed of and the part that remains. There is also a special provision for part disposals in paragraph 22 which deals with disposals of land in the United Kingdom and ripe for development. However, in Schedule 7 the draftsman seems to have forgotten the phrase 'part disposal' for in paragraph 2 he speaks of a disposal of part of an asset, while in paragraph 3 he speaks of the disposal of an interest in an asset.

Paragraph 14 (1) of Schedule 7, which is without prejudice to clause 21, says, somewhat unnecessarily, that the grant of an option is a disposal of it, even where the option is not exercised. On the other hand, if the option is exercised, the grant of the option and the grantor's fulfilment of obligations are to be treated as a single transaction (paragraph 14 (3)). Consequently, if he is bound to sell, the option consideration is part of the consideration for the sale. If he is bound to buy, the cost of the option is part of the purchase cost. Exercise, or abandonment, of an option is not a disposal. But in the case of exercise, the option merges with the transaction carried out by the person exercising the option in that behalf (paragraph 14 (3)). An option binding the grantor to both buy and sell is treated as two options, the total consideration being divided equally between the two (paragraph 14 (6)). The use above of references to buying and selling is an abbreviation: it includes other kinds of acquisitions and disposals. Forfeited deposits are treated in the same way as option consideration.

A shareholder can pass value to another shareholder in the same company by acquiescing in a reduction in the rights attached to his own shares. Where he has control of the company and so exercises that control as to achieve this result, that is deemed to be a disposal (which presumably means a part disposal) of the shares (paragraph 15 (2)). The same applies to rights other than shares, and also where the value passes out of shares etc. of the controller, but also out of shares etc. of a person with whom he is connected. 'Control' is as defined in paragraph 3 of Schedule 17. Where the terms of a lease are altered in favour of the lessor, there is a 'disposal' (not a 'part disposal') by the lessee of his interest in the property (paragraph 15 (3)). Where an asset is subject to a right or restriction, the extinction or abrogation, wholly or in part, of the right or restriction by the person entitled to enforce is a disposal by him (paragraph 15 (4)). Where a premium is taken on a lease, there is a part disposal of the freehold (Schedule 8, paragraph 2 (1)). Conveyance or transfer of an asset by way of security, and its re-transfer on redemption, do not amount to disposals or acquisitions (clause 21 (6)). The sub-clause is expressed to apply also to the conveyance or transfer of an interest in, or right over, the asset, and also the transfer of a subsisting interest or right by way of security in or over an asset.

We return now to clause 21 (3) which lays down a fairly general rule that there is a disposal of assets by their owners where any 'capital sum' is derived from assets. This is so even where the person paying the capital sum acquires no asset. Examples of the receipt of capital sums which fall within this rule are then given:

(a) by way of compensation
  (i) for any kind of damage or injury to assets;
  (ii) for the destruction or dissipation of assets; or
  (iii) for any depreciation or risk of depreciation of assets.
(b) under a policy of insurance of the risk of any kind of
  (i) damage or injury to assets; or
  (ii) the loss or depreciation of assets.
(c) in return for
  (i) forfeiture; or
  (ii) surrender; or
  (iii) refraining from exercising rights.
(d) as consideration for use or exploitation of assets.

As regards (c), the draftsman perhaps had in mind Great Northern Railway Co v. C.I.R. ([1901] 1 K.B. 416, 427) where it was held that the owner of unworked coal who gave to the surface owner a written undertaking not to work it, did not thereby convey any property in the coal.

What is a 'capital sum'? This brings us to the remarkable definition in clause 21 (9) which says that it means

> 'any money or money's worth which is not excluded from the consideration taken into account in the computation under the said Part I of Schedule 6 to this Act'.

Schedule 6 nowhere directly says what that consideration is; it merely specifies the kinds of consideration which have to be excluded. The principal exclusion is consideration which is itself charged as income for tax purposes, or is a receipt to be taken into account in computing income so charged.

Clause 26 (8) says that if under the clause an asset is not a 'chargeable asset', then no chargeable gain or allowable loss shall accrue on its disposal. Clause 26 (1) excludes from chargeable assets

> 'A mechanically propelled road vehicle constructed or adapated for the carriage of passengers' unless it is a

> 'vehicle of a type not commonly used as a private vehicle and unsuitable to be so used'.

There is a similar exemption from short-term gains tax. Savings certificates and non-marketable securities issued under the National Loans Act, 1939 (or corresponding Northern Ireland Act), are not chargeable assets (clause 26 (3)). These assets are fully defined in clause 26 (7). Rights to winnings obtained by participating in any pool betting or lottery or game with prizes are not chargeable assets (clause 26 (5)).

Paragraph 10 of Schedule 7 deals with insurance policies other than policies on human life. Neither the rights of insurer nor the rights of the insured 'shall constitute an asset on the disposal of which a gain may accrue'. Life policies are chargeable assets but the scope of charge to capital gains tax on their disposal is cut down by clause 27.

CORPORATION TAX

What is a Close Company? – II

PARAGRAPH 1 of Schedule 17 speaks of a close company as being 'under the control of' five or fewer participators, or participators who are directors. Paragraph 3 (1) says that for the purposes of the Schedule a person 'shall be taken to have control of a company' in certain circumstances which it sets out. It adds that where two or more persons together satisfy any of the conditions, they shall be taken to 'have control' of the company. They must, of course, be 'participators' before their control can make the company a close company, but it will be unusual for them to have such control without being participators. We can deal with the definition of 'participator' later. To add to the confusion paragraph 3 uses the expression 'members', a word to which it also attaches two special definitions.

The various circumstances which constitute control are divided by paragraph 3 (1) into three main groupings, (a), (b) and (c). Group (c) is the simplest and can be disposed of at once. A person has control within group (c)

> 'if in the event of a winding-up he would be entitled to the greater part of the assets available for distribution among members'.

'Member' includes any person having a share or interest in the capital or income of the company; a definition almost word for word the same as in section 255 (2) of the Income Tax Act, 1952. Taking those words by themselves, they do not extend to a debenture-holder (C.I.R. v. Woolf & Co (Rubber) Ltd (40 A.T.C. 137)). However, for the purpose of (c) the meaning of 'member' is further extended to include a person who is a loan creditor of the company otherwise than in respect of any loan capital or debt issued or incurred by the company for money lent by him to the company in the ordinary course of a business of banking carried on by him. What is, and what is not, a business of banking is a question which of itself is of considerable uncertainty, as is emphasized in last week's judgment in United Dominions Trust Ltd v. Kirkwood which we mention on another page. 'Loan creditor' means a creditor in respect of

(i) any redeemable loan capital issued by the company; or

(ii) a debt

- (a) for money borrowed or capital assets acquired by the company; or
- (b) for any right to receive income created in the company's favour; or
- (c) for consideration substantially less than the debt (including any premium).

It follows from group (c) that a company can have close company status forced upon it by its need to borrow money and its inability to obtain that money from a bank. The creditor, or indeed the shareholders, entitled to half the surplus assets may have no say whatever in the running of the company. The test applied by group (c) closely follows the test laid down in section 258 (2) of the Income Tax Act, 1952, which was confined to investment companies.

The tests in (a) and (b) of paragraph 3 (1) have obviously been copied from paragraphs (a) and (b) of section 256 (2) of the Income Tax Act, 1952 (which stems from section 19 of the Finance Act, 1936), notwithstanding that the drafting of twenty-nine years ago cries out for improvement. Taking (a) first, a person is to be taken as having control if he

(i) exercises; or
(ii) is able to exercise; or
(iii) is entitled to acquire control, whether direct or indirect, over the company's affairs. It would seem that 'control over the company's affairs' means voting control in general meeting. Most articles of association vest day-to-day control in the directors but apparently this directorial control is not included; otherwise it is difficult to understand the specific reference in paragraph 1 (1) to control by participator directors. The words 'direct or indirect' probably have in mind control through intermediate holding companies.

As to being entitled to 'acquire' control, paragraph 1 (2) extends this to cover a person who 'is entitled to acquire at a future date or will at a future date be entitled to acquire'. One is left to speculate on the difference (if any) between these two. It is not clear whether the 'future date' is to be a known date, such as April 6th, 2065, or whether it includes say the death of a known person, i.e., a date which must occur although nobody knows when. If, for instance, the articles provide that shareholder X. (aged 90), will have the option on the deaths of eleven other members (aged 21) to acquire their voting shares, for some astronomical price, does this mean that X. is in control?

Without prejudice to the generality of the first part of paragraph (a) described above, a person is to be taken as having control

> 'if he possesses, or is entitled to acquire, the greater part of the share capital or voting power in the company'.

This shows that 'control', even in paragraph (a), is not confined to control in the ordinary sense. If a person is entitled to acquire in the future some non-voting preference shares which represent 51 per cent of the issued shares, he is in control.

Paragraph (a) thus overlaps with paragraph (b) which is concerned with ownership of 'issued share capital'. Under (b) a person is taken to have control if he possesses, or is entitled (in the extended sense) to acquire

(i) the greater part of the issued share capital of the company; or
(ii) such part of that capital as would, if the whole income of the company were in fact distributed to members, entitle him to receive the greater part of the amount so distributed; or
(iii) such redeemable share capital as would entitle him to receive on its redemption the greater part of the assets which, in the event of a winding-up, would be available for distribution among members.

Item (iii) did not appear in section 256 (2). 'Member' in item (iii) has the extended sense mentioned in relation to (c) above and the reference to redeemable share capital includes loan capital.

In relation to all of (a), (b) and (c), any rights or powers which are vested in A. on behalf of B., or which B. may require A. to exercise, are to be attributed to B. (paragraph 1 (3)). However, it does not appear that this attribution is exclusive. If this interpretation were not correct, it would follow that a person in whom rights and powers were vested beneficially could avoid paragraph 1 by entering into a contract with some other person to exercise the rights as that person directed, although the circumstances were such that it was highly unlikely that any such direction would be given.

Notwithstanding the inclusion of 'direct and indirect' in paragraph 1 (1) (a), and the attribution to a person of rights and powers which another person can be required to exercise at his direction or on his behalf, there is also paragraph 1 (4) which deals specifically with rights and powers which companies have, or which under paragraph 1 (3) can be attributed to companies. These rights and powers can be attributed to another person, for paragraph 1 (1) purposes, if he alone, or with his associates, has control of such companies. If, by any permutation of attributions, the ultimate company can be said to be under the control of five or fewer persons then it is a close company.

Regional Retail Patterns

THE retail trade is a vital component in the national economy. The changing size, distribution and ownership of shops is of wide economic significance and of growing interest to the accounting profession. The retail trade as an employer, as a creator of capital assets and as a holder of stocks, generates a growing demand for professional expertise.

These problems of change and the danger of making generalizations on ready-to-hand impressions from one or two areas of the country only, can be illustrated from the patterns of distribution in different regions from the recently issued results of the 1961 Census of Distribution. This shows that regional patterns not only vary (which most people expect), but that they vary unexpectedly.

For example, retail turnover does not vary as does unemployment between areas. In 1961 (and it may well still be true) retail turnover per head of population was larger on Tyneside than around Birmingham, and higher in Scotland than in Wales. These facts come out of a study of regional spending published recently in the Board of Trade Journal based on the 1961 Census of Distribution.

Care has to be taken in breaking down overall figures for the regions into types of purchase, for the statistics relate to kinds of shops and not to types of commodities. But bearing this in mind, some interesting regional differences come out which point to varying buying habits. For example, turnover per head for Wales was the lowest of all regions but this was not so for every kind of business. The low ratio was built up from low figures in food, general stores and household goods shops. Again, in Scotland, sales in clothing shops and in the confectionery, tobacconist and newsagent group were above the national average and second only to the south-east of England.

Interesting differences also come out of a comparison of the density of shops, that is to say, the population served per shop. London and the south-east, Scotland and the Tyneside area, all had low densities of shops and the two last have, of course, comparatively low densities of population. The outstanding case in this analysis is the north-west (that is the Lancashire area) which had the highest shop density with the highest population density in the country. Lancashire comes out as the area with the most 'little shops around the corner'.

This also shows in the comparison of the average sales per shop. In the south-east, where department stores, supermarkets and self-service shops have an outstanding hold, the average sales per establishment were £19,000 in 1961; whereas in the north-west they were easily the lowest of all at only £11,800. The East and West Ridings of Yorkshire came second lowest at £13,100.

The analysis of persons, per 10,000 of population, engaged in retailing does not disclose any very significant differences between regions. The highest average number per 10,000 engaged in retailing was in the south-west at 451, with London and the south-east a close second at 445, and Scotland third at 440. The lowest figure was recorded in the Midlands at 390, with Wales second lowest at 400. Allowance was made for part-timers in the official count of numbers employed.

So far as sales per person engaged are concerned, the highest figure was recorded by London and the south-east, followed by the Midlands, and the lowest figures were recorded by the north-west and the south-west. In all areas a larger turnover per person compared with 1957 was being handled by about the same size of labour force. Of a total increase of 18 per cent in the value of turnover handled, only 4 per cent was accounted for by higher prices.

One interesting feature which comes out of this comparison between regions for a single year, is that there seem to have been much wider divergences in turnover per head of population and in shop densities than there were in the average number of persons employed or in the sales per person engaged. This looks like a paradox; but the answer may be that small shops are very often family businesses in which long hours are worked.

Most advanced electronic calculator in existence?

Probably

Certainly

The new Friden* 130 Electronic Calculator is mid-way between a mechanical desk calculator and an electronic computer. It has no moving parts — all calculations are performed by solid-state electronic components, and entries and answers are displayed on a cathode ray tube like a miniature T.V. screen. It works in milliseconds and it works silently.

Operation of the 130 is through a very simple keyboard with clearly marked controls. Results appear on four registers making it possible to work on multistop problems in logical order without manually re-entering amounts. All entries and answers are automatically aligned around a selected decimal point. In classic simplicity and elegance of design, it is unmatched among today's office machines.

A Cool Look at Staff Pensions

by G. B. HOLT

THE company secretary and/or accountant, harrassed by such problems as corporation tax, capital gains tax, pay demands, dock strikes and the difficulty of expressing in coherent form the minutes of that last singularly disjointed board meeting, may be forgiven for being tempted to leave the staff pension scheme to take care of itself. The present scheme has run satisfactorily for years, he may feel, and surely if any changes were desirable, Messrs Thingummy & Co, who look after it, would let him know. But so important are pension arrangements to the future happiness of the employees and so costly is the provision of these benefits that it is prudent from time to time to take a cool look at the arrangements. However much 'on the ball' Messrs Thingummy & Co may be, it is always possible, for example, that they may not have facilities for administering the type of scheme that would be most suitable for the circumstances of the particular company. A review of the arrangements may produce a useful outcome even if it merely results in a sudden refurbishing of the existing scheme.

Wide Variety of Schemes

It is perhaps a pity that there is no such thing as a pension shop where it would be possible to select the most suitable ready-made scheme to fit a particular company or to arrange for one to be specially tailored to requirements, for this might bring home the bewilderingly wide choice that is available. I wonder how many companies, faced with the problem of setting up pension schemes, have adopted the apparently sensible idea of writing to a number of different life offices to ask for quotations. Doubtless, if this has been done, the executive concerned has then sat back and awaited the quotations, confident that it would be a simple matter to place them in order of cost and to pick the cheapest for recommendation to the board.

However, when the submitted quotations were studied, the realization will have started to dawn of the difficulty, and often complete unfeasibility, of making an exact comparison. Not only will he have been trying to compare chalk with cheese, but also with boots, coke and liquorice allsorts. For entering into a pension scheme is not like buying a definite quantity of a straightforward commodity for which exact quotations can be given. Basically, a pension scheme involves providing an unascertainable number of employees with unascertainable monthly payments for an unascertainable period and paying for these by instalments over an unascertainable period, with such instalments gathering interest at an unascertainable rate.

Whatever assumptions may be made, it will soon be realized that it is out of the question to attempt to predict what the cost of providing pensions is going to be over any long period of time. After wrestling with the problem and discovering that usually no two quotations can, in fact, be exactly compared, he may be left wondering what his board's reaction will be when he explains that after an exhaustive examination of a number of quotations he has made a careful selection – with a pin.

In considering the setting up of a new scheme or the reviewing of an existing one, I would suggest that the first point is to try to decide exactly what the benefits are that it is desired to obtain for the staff; the second is to get an idea of how much these benefits will cost; and the third to decide on the best method of providing the benefits.

Most Common Fault

Probably the most common fault of pension schemes, particularly those set up many years ago, is simply that they are inadequate – the benefits they provide are not enough to enable the employees to continue after retirement to enjoy a standard of living to which they have been accustomed. We have all heard of sad cases of employees who have given loyal service for years having to face their retirement knowing that their pensions will only amount to a small fraction of the salary that they have been earning in their last working years. Arrangements made some thirty or forty years previously may at the time have seemed entirely reasonable, but the fall in the value of money and the rise in pay levels can result, under many schemes, in the employee's pension being ludicrously small. With this point in mind modern schemes tend to provide for pensions to be determined by the salary earned by the employee in the last years of employment. A pension of two-thirds of retiring salary is the maximum that is permitted for a fund to be approved by the Inland Revenue. However, companies who base pensions in this way on retiring salaries must realize that this will be costly. In trying to estimate what the commitment will involve, it is desirable to take into account the possibility, or some would say the certainty, of a further steady decline in the value of the £, which inevitably would result in a corresponding increase in salary levels.

Other points to be taken into account include the provision to be made for the early retirement of employees for ill-health or other reasons, and the benefit to be paid in the event of the death of an employee, either before or after retirement. The problem of a widow has to be considered. There is obviously a wide difference between the position of a wife widowed when young, who is likely to remarry, and that of a wife who is left in middle age and who may be expected to be entirely dependent on her pension for many years to come. If the benefit for a widow is to take the form of a pension rather than a lump sum, schemes are often arranged so that the pension will cease on remarriage.

Basis of Cost

A major point of principle which has to be decided is whether the contributions to the scheme are merely going to be based on present salary rates or whether an attempt is to be made to take into account the future trend of salaries with a view to spreading the cost as evenly as possible over the years. For example, let us consider young Joe sitting over there; he appears to be achieving the not inconsiderable feat of studying the form, at one and the same time, of the trial balance, the runners for the 2.30, and the new young lady who has just joined the department. He is at present 22 and, quite rightly, is earning a modest salary. But his unruffled ability to deal with three widely divergent matters at the same time indicates that he has potential. Is the contribution towards his pension simply to be based on his present age and salary? His salary may progress slowly during his first years, but in later years it may increase sharply. If pensions are to be based on retiring salary it may be desirable to take into account the likelihood of the salaries of Joe and his like increasing, and to spread the cost over the years, thus avoiding throwing an undue burden on the later years. This is a point that applies particularly when a high proportion of the staff is young. A scheme that is designed to spread the cost in this way must obviously involve the payment of larger contributions in the early years than one which ignores this factor.

Here at once can be seen how misleading it may be to compare quotations for schemes which at first may seem similar but, in fact, are fundamentally different. Obviously it would be quite illogical to select a particular scheme merely because the first year's cost happened to be the lowest, if in later years the expense was likely to rise suddenly and sharply, possibly catching the company by surprise at a time when it might be having a lean period in profits.

The main advantage of obtaining an approximate idea of the costs is not to try to use these for a direct comparison between the different schemes, but rather to obtain a reasonable idea of the expense of providing the various possible benefits. Should the total cost be higher than the company can afford, the benefits must be trimmed – for the present at least. Later, the company may be in a position to increase contributions, in which case the scheme could be revised to obtain increased benefits.

The third stage is to consider the best method of providing the proposed benefits. This can be done either by means of a scheme underwritten by a life office, or by establishing for the company a privately-invested fund into which all contributions are paid. If the company is a small one, an insured scheme is the obvious answer. One of the main decisions then to be made is whether the scheme is to be written on a with-profit or a non-profit basis. In the past, schemes were normally of the non-profit type, but in recent years the life offices have offered with-profit contracts. These have become very popular since it is generally considered that the bonuses that are likely to be paid will result in the ultimate cost of such a scheme being less than that of a non-profit scheme.

With-profit Schemes

In the case of with-profit schemes, the usual practice is for the bonuses allotted to take the form of a deduction from the premiums. It will be appreciated that if it is difficult to make a reasonably direct comparison between two non-profit schemes, a comparison between with-profit schemes is a great deal harder. The amount of bonuses that each office will be able to pay can only depend on the future level of profits. Past records may provide some guide to bonus levels, but a company that has been highly successful may not necessarily continue to show above-average results in the future. Furthermore, the method of giving quotations varies considerably; one life office may make its calculations on the full current rate of bonus, another at some lower rate, and a third may leave the bonuses out of account altogether. In some schemes the guaranteed amount of pensions may be high and the bonus low; while in others the bonus element may be of considerably more importance. At one time the endowment policy type of scheme was much favoured by pension consultants, but since the passing of the Finance Act, 1956, such a scheme has been at a disadvantage from the point of view of income tax, due to the fact that it cannot be written under section 379 of the Income Tax Act, 1952. The interest earnings are not exempt from tax in the hands of the life office, with the result that rather larger premiums have to be charged.

Companies that still have endowment schemes in operation to provide the whole of their employees' pensions would do well to review the position. However, it may be advantageous to use the endowment type of scheme to provide part of the benefit. By this means up to one-quarter of the total benefit may be taken in the form of cash. This can have tax advantages, since the cash can then be used to buy an annuity of the type that, being taxable under section 27 of the Finance Act, 1956, is only liable to tax on the interest content.

Deposit Administration Method

If a company has a high rate of turnover of staff, the most suitable method of providing benefits may be by means of what is known as 'deposit administration'. With this method the contributions are paid into a special fund and the life office controlling it allows interest on the fund at a rate that is usually geared to the actual earnings of the life office on all its investments. When an employee leaves, instead of the employer having to surrender contributions, which results in expense, the money is simply held as a reserve to secure benefits for the other members.

A method known as 'controlled funding' has been adopted in recent years. This method can enable the cost of pension benefits to be spread over a period of years, so as to avoid sharp increases as employees reach retirement age. Controlled funding can be used either for the ordinary type of group pension scheme or for deposit administration.

When a company finds that its annual contributions have begun to exceed about £10,000 a year, it may well give consideration to providing retirement benefits by means of a privately-invested fund. Instead of paying premiums to a life office, all the contributions are paid into a private fund, the whole of which is available for the employees, subject only to any deductions to meet the running costs. The first advantage of this method is that it is very much more flexible. There being no contract with any life office, it is a great deal easier to 'tailor' a plan to meet the exact requirements of a particular company and to alter it whenever conditions may change. However, the main advantage that companies have in mind when adopting this method is that it is likely to provide the required benefits at a lower cost than any insurance schemes. Often it is not realized how important is the yield factor; that is, the amount of interest earned on the contributions paid to the life office or into a private fund.

No Capital Gains Tax

Many companies probably have no idea what the effective yield is in respect of their contributions to an insured scheme. The life offices are usually very reluctant to disclose this information. Yet an increase in yield of only 1 per cent can reduce the cost of providing pensions by about 20 per cent. A well-invested private fund should be able to show an excellent net yield, since the running costs are low. An actuary's report is normally only needed about once every five years.

A particular advantage of a private fund is the fact that by investing a proportion of the fund in equities, a hedge can be obtained against inflation. Unless one is optimistic enough to believe that the purchasing value of the £ in the future will remain static, it is obviously wise for a proportion of the fund to take the form of ordinary shares, bearing in mind that the whole of any capital profits will belong to the private fund and that there is no liability for capital gains tax. Some funds are entirely invested in equities.

Often company executives do not feel that they themselves would wish to be responsible for running a private fund and prefer to use professional corporate trustees for the purpose. This can also avoid the risk of a conflict of interest between employers and employees. Professional trusteeship can be obtained at a modest cost. The corporate trustee can hold the securities, manage the properties, invest the contributions, collect the income and pay the pensions.

The pros and cons of contracting out of the Government scheme or remaining in it are much debated. The arguments each way are fairly evenly balanced. A useful point to bear in mind when a company having either an insured scheme or a private fund has contracted out, concerns the payments in lieu that have to be made to the National Insurance Fund every time an employee leaves the service of his employer unless his pension rights are to be preserved in another way. In most cases payments in lieu are expensive in relation to the benefits provided. But it is now possible for trustees to get round this difficulty by purchasing deferred annuities instead of making payments in lieu.

The best advice that one can give to any company official reviewing his firm's pension arrangements is quite simply to seek the best advice. Few companies would ever consider buying land and constructing buildings without obtaining independent advice from surveyors or architects. Yet it is curious how, when pension matters are concerned, companies will often start – and continue for years – a pension scheme relying entirely on the free advice of those providing the pensions or of their agents. Pension schemes are costly, the underlying problems are highly technical, and there can be a fundamental conflict of interest between the various parties to the contract. The cost of obtaining an independent report from a consulting actuary, who under his code of ethics can advise only in the best interests of his client, is likely to prove to be money well spent since it may well result in future expense being saved or greater benefits obtained for the same contributions.

A Plan for Accountancy Education – II

by KENNETH S. MOST, LL.B., F.C.A.
Head of the School of Accountancy, Singapore Polytechnic

IN the first part of this article the problems of accountancy education were viewed in relation to preparation for full professional status at university degree level. In addition to its technologists, however, the accountancy profession must have an adequate supply of technicians.

The Technician Problem

The English-speaking countries do not provide for a technician qualification in the structure of the accountancy profession[1]. There are in the United Kingdom, it is true, a number of certificates available for students of book-keeping and accounts at technician level, but possessors of such certificates are not accepted as members of the accountancy profession. Between the clerk, or machine operator, and the graduate or qualified accountant, there is no generally recognized technician status.

The accountancy profession in the United Kingdom has frequently been reproached, both by outside critics and its own members for having failed to advance the variety of services it offers to its clients in accordance with their manifest needs. Thus, it has been pointed out, the design and installation of cost accounting systems has become largely a function of management consultants; financial advisory services have been left to bankers, stockbrokers, economists, and even financial journalists; tax planning has shown signs of reverting to the legal profession and some senior accounting appointments have gone to non-accountants who have been deemed better able to familiarize themselves with the wider preoccupations of international groups of companies operating under conditions of some complexity.

Accountants in practice have been able to reply that their professional days extend long into their private nights; that they have neither time nor energy to grapple with these problems after their primary responsibilities in auditing and taxation have been fulfilled; and that the structure of the profession does not permit either specialization or the employment of an adequate number of qualified accountants to relieve them of their routine technical work. Even the accountant in business is familiar with this situation, although by and large he is better served.

Its origins may be traced to the lack of book-keeping education in primary and secondary schools, which has diverted attention from the need to develop skills in this field. Whereas a youth of 16 or 18 joining a firm of accountants or the accounting office of a business has some knowledge of history and geography and elementary mathematics, and can build his career upon these, no comparable grounding in accounts provides a point of departure for his future development. One may perhaps exclude Scottish schools from this sweeping assertion for, of course, Scottish boys have always enjoyed this advantage over English boys in the worlds of finance and office management.

Attraction and Incentive

It would be possible to overcome this difficulty if a recognized qualification of 'accounting technician' were available, similar to the national certificates in business and other subjects. Such a qualification would attract young people by virtue of its esteem and the prospects of future gain which its possession would hold out. It would also provide employers, notably public accountants, with a means to offer incentives to clerks to improve their education, and an assurance to those employing clerks already qualified that they were capable of taking over a large part of the routine work to be done with a minimum of supervision. At the moment there is no alternative for an ambitious youngster wishing to progress in accountancy to the struggle for a full accountancy qualification; and if the standards of the profession continue to rise, the number of clerks willing to undertake this struggle on a part-time basis must at some point diminish.

In the past, such technicians as the public accountant has employed have been either articled clerks or unqualified clerks. Neither has been very satisfactory; the articled clerk should be helped to become a professional man and his work to this end should take precedence over the 'scrubbing-brush' jobs in which an accountancy practice abounds. The ability of many unqualified men in accountants' offices is undoubted and their contribution great, but their numbers must be severely limited as long as they feel themselves outside the main stream of professional accountancy, and possess no formal way to improve their status.

It would seem time to tackle this problem by making provision for a new category of 'accounting technician' and by instituting a means whereby a qualified technician could transfer to full professional status if he wished to do so. If the professional accountancy bodies were sufficiently far-sighted to create a place for such technicians within their organizations, then not only would they be strengthened by the additional numbers thus acquired and the flow of income to be derived therefrom, but the maintenance of professional ethics could be supervised to a much greater extent than is possible at the present time.

There is a great danger that by ignoring this problem the accountancy profession is unwittingly creating the conditions whereby the public image of the accountant will deteriorate until all are classed as technicians, and they will no longer be called upon to make the social contribution which is their most important function. In such a case, business will simply go elsewhere. Furthermore, the longer the decision is postponed, the more difficult it will be to reach agreement with academic institutions about the scope and content of an accountancy course. Once it is seen that a proper system of training accounting technicians exists, then the broader scope and more speculative nature of a university-type course for professionals will become accepted by those members of the profession to whom at the present time a course is a poor substitute for traditional methods of training articled clerks[1].

The Syllabus

There is no doubt a great area for debate as to what constitutes a good syllabus for an accountancy course. The variety of courses devised by professional bodies and academic institutions for this purpose bears witness to this fact. On the other hand, it is suggested that a standard course is required for all entrants to the profession, irrespective of the field of subsequent specialization. This is not inconsistent with the multiplicity of possible solutions; it will suffice to choose one, as in marriage.

Moreover, delineation of the structure of the course still leaves individual institutions and teachers free to vary emphasis within it and to go beyond if necessary. In arriving at a syllabus, one attempts to lay down the area which must be covered; a good man will not normally find this enough.

[1] The report Recruitment and Training for the I.M.T.A. by R. W. V. Dickerson (I.M.T.A., April 1965) recommends a separation between financial administrators and accountants in the public service. This division may be the same as the technologist/technician one suggested here.

In an educational system such as that prevailing in the United Kingdom, certain assumptions have to be made about the necessary qualifications for entry, and these cannot be made in isolation from the remainder of the educational system. Academic institutions have tended to agree that a higher entry requirement is necessary for technologists than for technicians, and sooner or later the accountancy profession will be obliged to fall in line with this distinction.

Three-year University Course

Similarly, all the evidence points to the suitability of a three-year full-time course at university level for the education of professional accountants, where specialization is not included. The majority of institutions running courses have selected this length, and it corresponds roughly with the five-year part-time requirement for articled clerks.

The three years enable a student to proceed from the general to the particular in the main body of his study, which consists of accounting, law and economics. In the first year of accounting, for example, all the aspects of the subject which are unaffected by special conditions of trade or industry, legal status or sector of the economy, should be covered in depth. The first year's law should consist of an introduction to the history and structure of the legal system, with particular reference to the law of real property, and a fairly detailed coverage of that part of commercial law which is concerned with transactions – contract, agency, insurance, hire-purchase, negotiable instruments and so on. The first year's economics should begin with a study of social history and economic geography and extend over a review of the development of economic theory down to the present time.

In the second year, the accounting course should introduce the special aspects of accounting for particular types of business and of legal structure. This is the point at which partnership, company, bankruptcy and executorship accounts should be studied in detail, together with the more complex parts of cost accounting. The law course will support this study by introducing the law pertaining to institutions – partnerships, companies, succession, insurance companies, banks, trusts and the like. In economics, the student will cover both economic theory in depth, and also methods of economic analysis, such as statistics and financial mathematics. At this point, the 'systems' aspect of conventional financial and cost accounting courses should be treated in a rational and comprehensive manner and related to other functions in this field, such as production control and marketing.

The third year's study could then be devoted to more complex problems involving groups of companies, international operations, cost studies and the application of statistical methods to accounting routines. The law of taxation would be the main burden of the law course. In economics, attention would be switched from macro- to micro- economic studies, with particular reference to organization, management and communication. The subject of auditing may be introduced at this point, and preferably combined with valuation, in order to give the student an insight into one purpose of the audit, which he may otherwise tend to confuse with the discovery of fraud. This is also the proper place for a study of budgeting, which can only be understood in relation to problems of organization, management and communication.

The Technicians' Course

For a technicians' course it is suggested that a two-year full-time equivalent course will suffice, although this will undoubtedly be taken by day-release or part-time study over a longer period. The reason for this lies in the nature of the course; in extent, it will cover approximately the same ground as present-day professional courses to Intermediate level, but it will do so in more detail and with a substantially greater amount of workshop time and practical exercises.

As in the major course, the three areas of study are accounting, law and economics, but the emphasis is totally different. In the first year's accounting, not only will book-keeping be taught as a method, but the student will be familiarized with the main categories of equipment and taught how to recognize the applications for which each is suited. Commercial arithmetic will accompany and support this subject. Commercial law as a subject will extend over more or less the same ground as the major course, but the coverage will be more summary. Economics may be compared with a subject which has now disappeared from the syllabuses of professional bodies; called 'general commercial knowledge' it covers monetary theory and practice and also certain aspects of applied economics, notably production, distribution and price.

In the second year the accounting content will cover company and partnership accounts in great detail, and also company secretarial practice, cost accounting to intermediate level and auditing. Law will be restricted to partnership and company law and an introduction to taxation. Economics will be combined with organization and management and be particularly concerned with business finance and capital budgeting.

Conclusion

It is appreciated that the idea of a more or less standard syllabus for each of these courses gives rise to the thought that the same objective might be attained by constructing a two-part course, the first part of which would be common to both technologists and technicians. Such a solution would not be desirable in view of the essentially different nature of the education required for each. The technologist's education must attempt to develop creativity; this implies exposure to a wide range of ideas and the assimilation of an entire culture. The technician's education must equip him with the technical knowledge necessary to enable him to put the technologist's ideas into practice.

Dr Pickard made it plain in his paper[1] that he thought that something should be done for accountants working at the technician level. Although educationalists can point the way to achieving this objective, it rests with the professional bodies to state their needs and ensure that courses are established which coincide with them. This article attempts to outline a basis on which such courses can be planned; it is to be hoped that the professional bodies will now turn their attention to this pressing problem.

Rules of Professional Conduct for Accountants

FOR many years past, the accountant in public practice in South Africa seeking guidance in regard to the acceptable professional conduct in particular circumstances has had to refer primarily to the disciplinary rules of the Public Accountants' and Auditors' Board, as approved by the Minister in accordance with the Public Accountants' and Auditors' Act, 1951, coupled with the Board's code of professional etiquette. If he was a Chartered Accountant (South Africa) he would also have had to refer to the rules of professional conduct as laid down by the particular provincial society of accountants of which he was a member; these latter rules were, by agreement, common to all four provincial societies.

On the other hand, a Chartered Accountant (South Africa) not in public practice was guided primarily by the rules laid down by his society but, in addition, by application of the bye-laws of the society, could be disciplined for conduct in contravention of the provisions of certain sections of the Public Accountants' and Auditors' Act. This meant that, to all intents and purposes, a South African chartered accountant not in public practice, while not being subject to the disciplinary powers of the Public Accountants' and Auditors' Board, was nevertheless required to have regard to the Board's disciplinary rules and so he had to be familiar with their requirements and restrictions on conduct.

All this has now been simplified to a considerable extent. Recently, the Board set about the task of revising its rules and code. The Joint Council of the Societies of Chartered Accountants of South Africa suggested that the time was opportune for the introduction of a code that would, so far as possible, be common to all South African accountants. As a result, a joint meeting of representatives of the Board and the Joint Council was able to collaborate in the drafting of a new code of professional etiquette which will meet the requirements of both bodies.

The new rules of professional conduct, prescribed by the councils of the four provincial societies and therefore applicable to South African chartered accountants generally whether or not in public practice have just been published. Publication of the Public Accountants' and Auditors' Board's Rules will be made shortly. These two sets of rules of professional conduct are identical so far as rules 1 to 10 are concerned with the exception that the title 'Chartered Accountant (S.A.)' is used in the one code while 'Registered Accountant and Auditor' is used in the other.

The rules lay down the procedure or etiquette to be observed in regard to professional appointments; signing of reports and certificates; quotations for professional work; fees; Press articles, advertisements for staff, delivery of lectures, publicity generally; professional work through the medium of companies; criticism of professional colleagues; competitors' staff; professional integrity. Finally, the chartered societies' code contains a rule requiring that a chartered accountant (S.A.) shall not conduct himself in a manner which constitutes improper conduct as set out in the disciplinary rules of the Public Accountants' and Auditors' Board as approved by the Minister of Finance from time to time.

In this way, the path of the accountant in South Africa is made slightly easier. Both types of accountant being now subject to common rules, it remains for a registered accountant and auditor to obtain the consent of the Board in certain circumstances before his conduct is permissible, while a chartered accountant (S.A.) will have to obtain the consent of his society in similar circumstances. A chartered accountant (S.A.) who is also a registered accountant and auditor (a position which applies to the vast majority of practising accountants) will be required to obtain the consent both of his society and of the Board.

CANADA

Education for the Profession

QUOTING a report to the American Institute of C.P.A.s on a public opinion survey of small and medium-sized manufacturing firms, Mr R. K. Moore, F.C.A., tells in The Canadian Chartered Accountant for May how it indicated that 'it simply does not occur to most business men to use you except for services long associated with the accounting profession'. Only 24 per cent of the respondents said that their public accountants had 'real business imagination'. It would seem, comments Mr Moore, that the profession has not, as a whole, advanced sufficiently to gain full recognition or develop a public image in keeping with its potential.

It seems obvious that the basic education for a C.A. qualification must be improved, and Mr Moore proposes the following:

(1) A university degree for entrance to the profession.
(2) A comprehensive yet practical educational syllabus.
(3) Broadening of the examination syllabus to require a good working knowledge of taxation, business management and the other specialist fields.
(4) More time – perhaps double the present – to be spent on formal training.
(5) Formal training to be given in periods of full-time attendance at an institution, spaced between periods of practical experience.
(6) Competent teachers and examiners to be developed by the profession.
(7) Modern techniques such as teaching machines, visual aids and the case method of study to be introduced.
(8) Annual examinations to be co-ordinated with instruction given at the provincial level.
(9) Only one uniform examination to be given at the final level. It might be given in stages and should be such as would assure a high standard of technical competence.

For this, Mr Moore thinks special professional schools might well be required, and he adds that some form of affiliation with the universities will be essential to secure Government financial assistance.

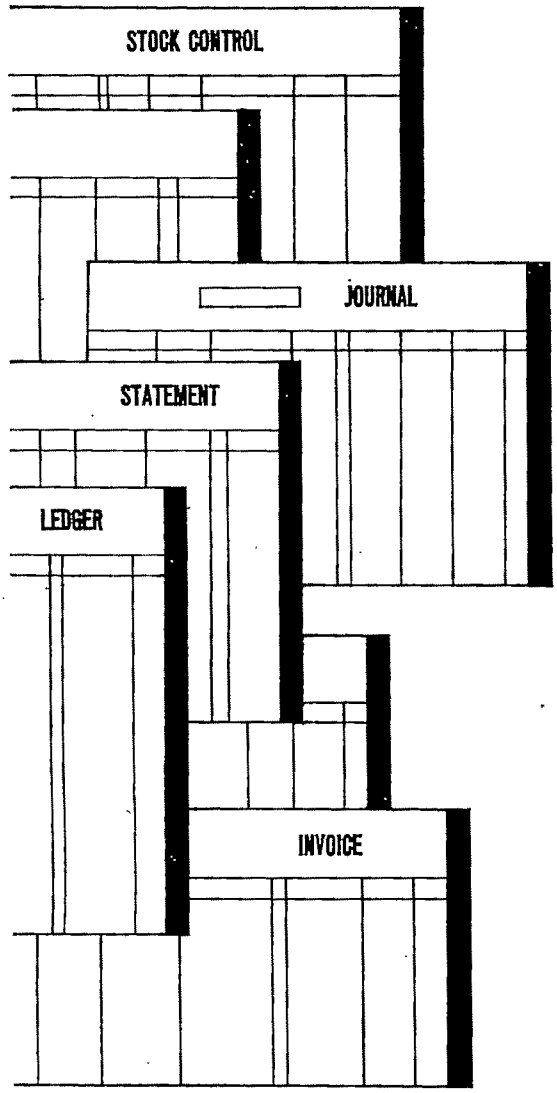
REPUBLIC OF IRELAND

Decimal Currency Recommended

THE report of the Working Party on Decimal Currency of the Irish Republic, which was published recently, recommends that the Republic should adopt a 10*s*-cent decimal system of currency. It is recommended that decimal coins should be introduced to replace the existing £ s d coins. These would be 20 cents (equivalent to 2*s*), 10 cents (1*s*), 5 cents (6*d*), 2 cents (2·4*d*), 1 cent (1·2*d*) and ½ cent (0·6*d*).

'In view of the Government's decision in principle to decimalize', says the report, 'it was obvious that it was not open to us to make a recommendation that could, in certain circumstances, mean that this country should not decimalize. We recommend, therefore, that this country's currency should be converted to a 10*s*-cent system as soon as possible'.

Other recommendations are that an agency should be set up with statutory powers to work out and supervise the detailed arrangements for the changeover, and the declaring of a preparatory period – of about two years – to make preparations for the changeover. On a given day at the end of the preparatory period, decimal currency would become the country's official currency; banks and other organizations would change over immediately. For another transitional period of two years after the changeover, during which all other organizations would gradually change to decimal currency as their machines were replaced or converted, two currencies would circulate. At the end of this transitional period, the currency would be based solely on decimals.



The report estimates the cost of machine conversion and replacement and the setting up and operation of the agency at £2·3 million. No recommendations are made by the report as to the size and composition of the new coins, but it emphasizes the necessity to take the preliminary steps for designing the new coinage at an early date.

Mr E. Graham, chairman of the committee, in a reservation, says that if it were found that Great Britain was about to introduce a £-cent system, then Ireland should also adopt that same system. Otherwise, grave confusion would arise in both countries in operating different systems.

costs are provided for on the accrual basis. Pay-as-you-go and terminal funding are unacceptable, for they make no provision for the cost of future retirement benefits during the employees' periods of active service. Provision in level annual amounts is preferred, because of the long-range nature of the commitments and the uncertainties of estimation.

As to past service cost, the study concludes that it should be taken into expense – together with related interest charges – systematically over a reasonable period following the inception of the plan. The cost to be accounted for is the cost of specific pension benefits for specific persons, not merely an amount necessary to keep the plan in operation. A weighted average of the remaining service lives of employees should be a starting-point in determining the actual period, but there should be some flexibility. While equal amounts are preferred, as with pension costs, diminishing annual amounts may be acceptable, in line with reduction of the number of employees as they retire.

Actuarial gains and losses should, for the most part, be spread over the current and future years. However, immediate recognition may be preferable where adjustments result from a single occurrence, such as the closing of a plant or a business combination. Unrealized appreciation or depreciation of common stocks and, in some cases, of bonds and other investments, should be recognized systematically in estimating costs for accounting purposes.

The study concludes that the unfunded prior service cost is not a liability to be shown on the employer's balance sheet. Ordinarily the amount to be so shown is the difference between the amount charged to expense and the amount paid. Any cost carried forward in accordance with the recommendations should be reflected as a deferred charge to operations.

Weekly Notes

WHAT IS A BONA FIDE BANKING BUSINESS?

SECTION 6 of the Money-lenders Act, 1900, defines 'money-lender' as including every person whose business is that of money-lending, or who holds himself out as carrying on that business. There are a number of exceptions, one of which is in favour of: '(d) any person bona fide carrying on the business of banking'. These words resemble the words 'bank carrying on a bona fide banking business' which appear in section 200 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1952, and clause 48 (3) (b) of the current Finance Bill.

Similar (but not identical) words appear in paragraph 4 (1) (c) of Schedule 17 to the current Finance Bill.

What do they mean? This was the subject of litigation last week in United Dominions Trust Ltd v. Kirkwood (The Times, June 16th). The plaintiff sued the endorser of some dishonoured bills of exchange, who pleaded the Money-lenders Act. Four questions arose:

(1) What was 'carrying on the business of banking?'
(2) Did the plaintiff carry on that business?
(3) What did 'bona fide' mean?
(4) If the plaintiff did carry on a banking business did it do so bona fide?

Mr Justice Mocatta said a useful test on question (1) was what the ordinary intelligent business man would call the business of a banker. One essential feature was the receipt of deposits of money. His lordship declined to say whether three further things were also essential, namely, taking money on current account, paying cheques drawn on oneself, and collecting cheques for customers. He merely assumed for the purpose of the case that they were also essential features. The plaintiff had always maintained current accounts and provided cheque forms for them, as well as collecting cheques for customers, granting overdraft facilities, and taking money on deposit. He held that at all material times it had carried on the business of banking.

'Bona fide' meant that the business must be a genuine banking business i.e. not carried on as a façade for what was really a money-lending business. His lordship was satisfied that the plaintiff also satisfied the test, and he gave judgment for the plaintiff accordingly. A precise definition of 'banking business' seems to be as far off as ever.

SURVEY OF COMPANIES

THE first results of a new survey of British companies undertaken by The Times and The Times Review of Industry and Technology were published in The Times on Monday. The first information to appear comprises a listing of the first one hundred companies ranked by reference to the capital employed, together with information relating to the equity market capitalization and number of employees. In addition, the total net profits before interest and tax are shown, expressed also as a percentage of capital employed and the amount per employee. Comparative figures for turnover have been obtained from 166 of the sample of 300 and, of those providing this information, The Times notes that it is the largest companies which have been readiest to provide this information.

No doubt as a preview of the further analyses to be presented in the July issue of The Times Review of Industry and Technology, the summary in The Times reproduces several charts showing variations between companies in respect of profits and the return on capital. The main statistical problem inherent in such inter-company comparisons is that the position of individual companies may be adversely affected after a bad trading year.

The Times editorial note comments on the fact that none of the ten companies recording the highest rate of return on capital are among the top one hundred firms. It seems, comments the City Notes, 'that the inevitably ponderous nature of very large companies to some extent limits profitability'. There will be many members of the profession, to say nothing of the investing public, for whom future analyses will prove of particular interest.

FERRANTI PROFIT REFUND

FERRANTI, the electronics company, has entered into an agreement with the Ministry of Aviation on the timing and method of repaying the £4¼ million profit which it earned out of the Bloodhound and Mark I missile contracts. The Minister told the House of Commons on June 17th that tax had already been paid on the profit and this the Government would retain and set off against the total amount. The balance of about £2 million would be repaid by five annual instalments up to September 1969. There is a proviso that no annual instalment shall exceed one-third of the consolidated net profits of the company in the preceding year. If there were any arrears, arising from this limitation, then such arrears would carry interest at 1 per cent above Bank rate, with a minimum of 5 per cent. The Government are working on a new formula for Government contracts in the hope of avoiding a repetition of the affair.

B.I.S. ON INTERNATIONAL PAYMENTS

THE annual report of the Bank for International Settlement published last week has a very different order of priorities for solving international monetary problems than those expressed by Mr Schweitzer of the International Monetary Fund who favoured greater liquidity when he spoke of this problem in Paris last month.

The B.I.S. considers that the urgent problem of the international monetary system is to obtain a better equilibrium in the balance of payments rather than by creating more liquidity. The idea of a return to the full rigours of the gold standard is rejected but they blame the current financial difficulties of the world on certain countries 'playing around with half measures'. This may be an allusion to the policies of the United States and the United Kingdom and of the two the position of the United Kingdom is considered to be the more serious. They think that the restrictions imposed by the April Budget will have to be maintained and take due note of the rapid rise in wages in the United Kingdom so far in 1965.

So far as the United States is concerned, the chairman of the B.I.S. said that the balance of payments position of the United States gives reason for great satisfaction but he is doubtful whether the voluntary control of capital exports by that country can be relied on indefinitely to balance its internal account and that the United States might have to increase its interest rates. This point about American interest rates is also underlined in the report.

4,000 YEARS OF ACCOUNTING

OPENING the exhibition entitled '4,000 Years of Accounting' at the John Rylands Library, Manchester, on Monday of last week, Sir William Mansfield Cooper, Vice-Chancellor of Manchester University, said: 'A moment's reflection serves to show how much industry – in all its branches – owes to the accountant. There, throughout history, he has sat keeping his tally, balancing his petty cash, going home contentedly to his cave, his wigwam, his igloo, his mud hut, on the evening of the day that the trial balance balanced, and doing all this without a scrap of awareness that man would build theories around him and that he would become, in time, one of the most potent sources upon which historians might draw.

'For his products – his books of accounts – have written the clue to much of man's development; and that not only – as one might expect – in the field of economic history, but in political, constitutional and social history; and not least, the history of ideas'.

The exhibition, as noted in our issue of June 5th, has been arranged jointly by the Library of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales and the John Rylands Library, and in the course of his opening remarks, Sir William paid tribute to the Institute on its splendid collection of early accounting works. 'Books of account', he said, 'are as old as time; books about books of account are much more modern, yet surprisingly old and it is here that the Institute's collection shows its great strength'. Sir William went on: 'As I have said, book-keeping must be almost as old as man himself... with the relevant amounts sketched on walls, or baked in clay, or notched in wood – and incidentally, if book-keeping has so distinguished a lineage so also has the computer, as anyone who has been in Russia or the East knows – for the abacus still carries on its invaluable aid to nearly every cash transaction there.

The revolution in book-keeping came, said Sir William, as in so many other intellectual activities, with the Renaissance, and it was from that time that reference to double-entry began to appear. Visitors to the exhibition would be able to trace something of the history of that revolution by reference to the original documents themselves.

The earliest exhibit is a Sumerian wage-list of the Ur dynasty of circa. 2350 B.C. on clay; clay tablets on which scribes recorded gifts brought to temples; papyri including taxation accounts of the first and second centuries A.D.; medieval and later books and documents covering a wide range of accounts, including wardrobe books of Edward I (1298), and a copy of Luca Pacioli's famous work on mathematics published in 1494, containing a reference to the 'methods of Venice', being the first mention of double-entry book-keeping.

The exhibition opens daily (Sundays excepted) until July 3rd at 10 a.m. and closes at 6 p.m. (9 p.m. on Wednesdays and 2 p.m. on Saturdays).

RECORD DEMAND FOR FINANCIAL EXECUTIVES

DEMAND in British industry for top-level financial executives now exceeds the supply on a scale never known before. Many firms report that it is taking them months to find the right man to fill vacancies for which skilled qualified accountants are required.

'Growth of industry and the need for effectual development and control of financial planning, are putting a premium on accountants with the appropriate experience in active management.'

This comment was made recently by Mr William Pearson, chief consultant of a company which specializes exclusively in finding managing directors, financial controllers, chief accountants and other executive accountants. 'Financial management problems', he continued, 'stem from inadequate practical training, premature promotions and the grouping of responsibilities around available personnel. The shortage of right men in this increasingly important sphere has established a special need for selection geared to the technique of correlating personal qualifications to the objectively planned jobs which competent financial executives seek.'

CHARTERED SECRETARIES' ANNUAL CONFERENCE

THE petitioning of the Queen for a new Charter to mark its seventy-fifth anniversary next year and the importance of post-qualification training were referred to by Mr Leslie R. Murray, F.C.I.S., President of The Institute of Chartered Secretaries in his opening address at the Institute's annual conference held at Eastbourne last week.

The two main objects specified in the Charter, Mr Murray said, are still likely to relate, as in the original Charter of 1902, to examinations and conferences and the publication of papers. He also said that the Council of the Institute was considering recognizing examinations set by universities and colleges of advanced technology providing courses in business administration.

The three principal speakers at the conference, which had as its theme 'Management education and the chartered secretary', were Sir John Fulton, M.A., LL.D., Vice-Chancellor of the University of Sussex, who spoke on 'The role of the new universities and the lowering of barriers between different fields of university study and research'; Sir Edward Playfair, K.C.B., Chairman of International Computers and Tabulators Ltd, who gave an address on 'The future of management training from the point of view of the employer, in the public and private sectors'; and Mr J. P. Martin-Bates, M.A., J.P., F.C.I.S., Principal of the Administrative Staff College, who spoke on 'The development of management studies in the last twenty years'. Following Mr Martin-Bates's address, conference syndicates discussed in general terms the main points raised by him and later each syndicate concentrated on one particular problem arising from the paper.

GOVERNMENT ON MACHINE TOOLS

THE Government has now outlined its plans for helping to modernize the machine tool industry. Mr Frank Cousins, Minister of Technology, announced last week that the Government would give certain assistance in stimulating designs and production of new types.

The main points which the Government propose are, first, that orders from the Government will be available for pre-production models and the National Research Development Corporation will be strengthened to increase research and development contracts. Second, special attention will be given to those machine tool manufacturers connected with electronic and technical engineering companies. Third, the Government will review the needs of its own establishments such as ordnance factories as a market for machine tools. Fourth, an expert unit will be established to co-ordinate research and development in Government plant with that of the industry's own research teams, the N.R.D.C. and the universities. Finally, a special working party to study the question of the Government holding stocks to overcome the industry's cyclical variations in demand is to be set-up.

INSTITUTE OF ACTUARIES' ANNUAL MEETING

OPENING his address at the annual meeting of the Institute of Actuaries last week, the President, Mr Herbert Tetley, C.B., M.A., F.I.A., expressed regret at the death during the past year of an unusually large number of the senior members of the profession, including the oldest and most senior member, the Rev. Louis Steele, who was born in 1867 and qualified in 1896. He and another deceased member, the Rev. J. F. S. R. Gibson, had long and distinguished careers as clergymen after becoming Fellows of the Institute.

Turning to the achievements of members, Mr Tetley stated that perhaps the outstanding event of the year had been the presentation of gold medals to Mr Wilfred Perks and Mr William Phillips for actuarial work of pre-eminent importance.

In a reference to membership the President indicated that following the raising of the entry requirements at the beginning of 1964, it was no longer intended to grant partial exemption from the Preliminary examination.

Recruitment to the profession continued to receive active attention, and a new edition of the Institute's booklet, The Actuarial Profession, would shortly be made available. In a reference to graduates Mr Tetley stressed the importance of providing them with interesting work in the early stages of actuarial training. The demand for actuaries continued to exceed the supply, particularly for posts abroad where members had achieved notable success.

The Institute continued to take an active part in the operation of the Financial Times – Actuaries Investment Index and into the investigation of, and publication of reports on, the mortality of lives assured, annuitants and members of pension schemes. A particularly notable activity in the past year had been the collation of statistics of the coverage of occupational pension schemes.

In a reference to the current Finance Bill as affecting members in partnership, Mr Tetley said that, after discussion with other professional bodies, joint representations had been made by the Institute and the Faculty of Actuaries regarding the serious effect of the proposed capital gains tax on such partnerships.

by an Industrious Accountant

CHAPTER 282

HE had been chief accountant in our company once, but had been forgotten by nearly everybody in the intervening years. Accountants in industry are birds of passage; they come and they go. When his letter came in the morning post, nobody knew the name at first. At length the office manager recalled it dimly. Thirty-odd years ago, old E. P. (comparatively young E. P. then) had stalked out of the counting-house in a towering rage, and next had been heard of in Australia. Why the sudden exit, nobody seemed to know. One moment he had been at the height of his career, a distinguished citizen, vice-chairman of his local accountants' society, a council member of the chamber of commerce . . . next moment he was gone.

Now, in comfortable retirement in his seventies, he had returned to his home town. His letter asked permission to come to see his former office for old times' sake – if it wasn't inconvenient. It was phrased in courtly old-fashioned style; there was a hope of meeting some familiar faces again; the tone was wistful. Thirty-odd years spell major changes in accountancy; it was sad to reflect how few faces from his past remained to greet him.

When I showed the directors his letter, they were less talkative than might have been expected. They picked their words carefully, I thought, and looked wary. 'H'm, yes, E. P. again', said the chairman. 'Didn't mince his words, did he?' 'Broke the glass door on his way out, didn't he?' murmured Prinny drily. The deputy-chairman looked disconcerted, but said nothing.

Well, I invited E. P. to lunch with us and to see over the offices, and he had a great day. He was a fine-looking old chap, despite the scanty white hair over his thin sallow face and deep-set eyes, and the sunken neck muscles betraying his age. Those who had worked with him gave him a tremendous welcome and he toured the premises like visiting royalty.

At first he was cheerful, asking after the old days and marvelling at the reconstructed offices and new equipment. He quietened gradually, however, as he saw the physical changes in the staff that greeted him, and as inquiries about missing colleagues brought the standard bleak response. His eyes blinked a few times. Like old soldiers, he seemed ready to fade away rather than to die as he listened. Still, his comments remained warmly humorous, his farewell to Prinny being unforgettable. 'I still remember you as a young rascal in the number three cashier's box, upping all the approved expenses dockets by ten shillings and pocketing the loot'. Not that Prinny turned a hair. 'Must have been my cousin you remember', he chuckled, and retired hastily.

The chairman greeted E. P. with his unfailing courtesy, and they chatted of old times at home and of business activities in the antipodes. They avoided personalities rather pointedly, I thought. Having heard some talk of E. P.'s bursting vitality and drive in the old days, it was something of an anticlimax to see him as a tired old man discussing the iniquities of politicians and the discourtesies of modern motorists . . . his sands were running out fast, poor chap.

Later, showing E. P. out, we met the deputy-chairman unexpectedly at the lift. He didn't relish meeting us; he half turned away, thought better of it, and compromised on a curtly patronizing nod before adjusting his raincoat with ostentatious unconcern. The erstwhile chief accountant eyed him with faint distaste. 'Still paying for those old Maidenhead week-ends, eh?' he asked suddenly. The D.-C. flushed crimson and his eyes bulged; in complete confusion he strode off to the stairway. E. P. made the Churchillian V-sign then stepped with a slight swagger into the lift. Whatever their chequered history had been in the controversies of the past, he had won the last battle.

Clarity of Presentation

UNITED Builders Merchants Ltd, whose accounts form this week's reprint, was formed in 1962 by the merging of William Dibben & Sons Ltd, of Southampton, and The Metal Agencies Co Ltd, of Bristol, two complementary groups in the builders' merchants industry. Additionally, within the group are U.B.M. Engineering Ltd, which is in structural engineering and agricultural machinery, U.B.M. Scaffolding Ltd, which hires and erects scaffolding, and the Avon Fireplace Co Ltd. From January 1st, this year, the company acquired Rownson, Drew & Clydesdale, builders' merchants, of High Wycombe.

The feature of the accounts is the clarity of their presentation. Throughout the report, including the directors' report, profit and loss account, balance sheets and notes, 1965 figures are shown against a light grey background with the 1964 comparisons against a background which this column describes as 'lime green'.

The result is not only pleasing to the eye but helpful to the reader, particularly where the figures in the notes are concerned. The columnar form of balance sheet is not taken to the extreme of précis on which some accounts can be faulted, with the result that the notes are not overloaded.

Companies' Contributions

The four-year record (the period since the merger) shows sales at £14,007,279, including scaffolding hire income. Pre-tax profits of £1,252,386 are shown as a return of 8·9 per cent on sales and of 19·7 per cent on net assets of £6,353,079. The 18 per cent dividend (the rate having been maintained on capital increased by a 'one-for-five' scrip issue) was 1·9 times covered by net earnings. The record also shows the number of ordinary and preference shareholders (4,930 and 951 respectively) and the number of employees, 2,426, these latter figures being given for the first time.

In his statement with the accounts, Mr F. Scantlebury, the chairman, comments on the performance of each individual company in the group and states the contribution each company made to the year's profits. The Metal Agencies Company contribution was 52 per cent, William Dibben & Sons 31 per cent, U.B.M. Engineering 7 per cent, and U.B.M. Scaffolding 10 per cent.

The Avon Fireplace Company does not figure in the percentage analysis because, during the year, the company's factory at Southampton was closed and production was transferred to Bristol. The company operates solely as a manufacturing unit for the group and its trading profits are included in those of the M.A.C. and Dibben merchant companies.

Public Relations

Mr Scantlebury asks 'shareholders who are going to build a house, carry out repairs or who require any of these companies' products, to tell their architect, builder or plumber to obtain his requirements through a U.B.M. supplier'. The M.A.C. in Bristol, all Dibben branches and the newly-acquired Rownson's at High Wycombe, he points out, 'have first-class showrooms where you can make a personal selection of bathrooms, kitchens, fireplaces, cookers, boilers, etc'.

With close on six thousand shareholders in the company Mr Scantlebury should reach some people who could back their investment by business and there is certainly nothing at all wrong in his use of the chairman's statement for a little public relations activity. But it does not end there.

Under 'Group Activities' the report includes a full run down of all companies in the group, with addresses and telephone numbers of all main depots, works and branches. The acquisition of the Rownson organization, incidentally, spread the group geographicaly. Based on High Wycombe, the new subsidiary has branches at Market Harborough and Stowmarket. Dibben operates mainly on the South Coast from Worthing to Torquay, and Metal Agencies largely in the Bristol area, so far as builders' merchants operations are concerned.

Bank Turnover

TURNOVER in banking terms is rather a nebulous affair. It is interesting none the less. Mr J. H. Hambro, chairman of Hambros Bank Ltd, which is the biggest of the merchant banks, says in his annual review that in the financial year to March 31st last, turnover 'exceeded on average £100 million each working day'. Disclosed net profits, on the banking formula of being shown 'after providing for taxation thereon and after making a transfer to inner reserves out of which provision has been made for diminution in value of assets' were £829,987, of which £790,961 were dealt with in the accounts of the bank and the balance retained by subsidiaries.

The daily turnover has grown over the years to the point where the bank, Mr Hambro says, 'should adopt the most up-to-date techniques available to us'. The decision has been taken to install a computer to handle many of the more routine clerical operations.

Considerable reorganization is involved if [the maximum benefit is to be derived. As a result, the type of work at present done by many members of the staff will be extensively changed.

Estate Duty Terrors

ALTHOUGH the position of Estate Duties Investment Trust with regard to the Finance Bill has yet to be resolved, Lord Piercy, the chairman, is in no doubt that the new turn of company taxation will mean more business for the Trust. At the thirteenth annual general meeting of EDITH on Friday (June 18th) he said that the provisions of the Bill would make it 'more desirable for persons interested as shareholders in private business, especially in a family business, to contemplate in good time the making of provisions to cover the possible liability (to estate duty) and to mitigate the effects on the management and the continuity of the undertaking'.

For the Trust the year to last March was an active one, resulting in a net increase in investments of £682,513. Total investments at the end of the year stood at £4,426,973 and further commitments were £347,965 compared with £414,264 in 1964.

With new tax complications adding to what Lord Piercy described as the 'prospective terrors of estate duty' it will be surprising if the Trust does not find an increasing demand for its services, experience and expertise.

CITY NOTES

STOCK exchange business has sunk to the point at which stockbrokers are taking a morbid interest in finding out whether they have done less business than the next man. The June figures of equity turnover in the market are expected to show the lowest business level since monthly figures were introduced last autumn.

Even prices hovering at the year's 'low' have failed to attract investment support, which is hardly surprising in view of the increasing evidence of the growing effect of the 'squeeze' on credit both nationally and internationally. It is the international scarcity of credit which is the main cause of institutional investment concern.

Not that the institutions lack the means of employment of funds. The string of high coupon industrial debentures continues to lengthen and yields of 7¼ per cent at placing prices find the institutions ready to take stock. There is also a fair volume of smaller investment demand when stocks come to be quoted.

But the equity market remains out in the cold and in the foreseeable future there is nothing which seems likely to alter the position quickly. Small turnover, with prices drifting lower still, looks to be the equity prospect for some time ahead.

Wage Payments by Credit Transfer

SIR, – The article on the payment of wages by credit transfer by Mr R. Conway in your issue of May 29th, made very interesting reading, but one would like to know what value was put upon the savings and advantages to set against the initial and continuing cost of a week's ex gratia wages to all participating employees. Perhaps the clearing banks made a contribution.

Yours faithfully,

London E15. JOHN BIGGS, F.C.A.

[Mr R. Conway writes: In reply to your correspondent I would say that our initial thinking on wage payments by credit transfer was largely influenced by the labour savings in not having to handle and put up wages on one particular day each week. Readers will probably appreciate that in a relatively small organization an endeavour is made to spread all duties out over the working week and, of course, wages cannot be put into a spreadable category. The other attractions were safety from petty pilfering and the elimination of errors in make-up and payment. There was no contribution by any external parties and interest on the additional week's payment must be regarded as a debit, but not a full week's payment for the whole year since after the ex gratia payment, the next wages payment is a full two weeks later. And taking one individual of, say, £10 a week earnings, the interest chargeable to outlay would be considerably less than 2½ per cent per year. I think your correspondent would agree that this could easily be saved in the economies achieved. The principal labour savings of the scheme, however, were the result of transferring to fortnightly payments from weekly payments.]

Bachelor of Accountancy Degree

SIR, – For several years the Singapore Polytechnic has been graduating students with a professional diploma in accountancy, which has been recognized by the Government of the State of Singapore, as mentioned in a recent note in 'The Accounting World' section of The Accountant (March 13th issue).

As a result of recent negotiations the University of Singapore has agreed to award its degrees to Polytechnic students enrolled with university entrance qualifications and following an approved syllabus. One of these degrees will be a 'Bachelor of Accountancy', abbreviated B.Acc.

I understand that this degree is unique in the British Commonwealth, but that there are one or two American universities awarding a degree of the same name and abbreviation; if any readers could enlighten me on this point I shall be very grateful as I have not yet managed to trace those concerned.

Needless to say, we feel very proud of our rarity, and look upon ourselves as pioneers in the field of university preparation for the accountancy profession.

Yours faithfully,

KENNETH S. MOST, LL.B., F.C.A.
Head, School of Accountancy.

The Real Issue

SIR, – Your editorial in the issue of June 12th, shows that you have joined with a number of other critics of economic events, including the City Editor of The Times, in arriving at the conclusion that there is little wrong with the economy that the free working of the market mechanism could not put right, so long as it had the assistance of a large dose of unemployment.

If you have no better suggestions to offer, I think it would be far better if you gave way to someone who believes that the real issue is how to use to the full all the assets of the nation, including its manpower. Such a practical demonstration of your beliefs would also give you the opportunity of experiencing life 'on the dole' and tasting a dose of the medicine which you so freely prescribe for others.

Yours faithfully,

London EC4. F. B. H. FOX.

Credit and Smaller Companies

SIR, – With reference to the correspondence on the above subject (your issue dated June 5th) your readers may be interested in the following statistics extracted from the home trade records of a medium-sized company dealing largely with wholesalers on a fairly constant pattern of trade.

The figures represent percentages of receipts to debtors compiled weekly on a calendar month basis then averaged monthly and the results averaged three-monthly.

January – March	79·66	88·58	80·68	69·14
April – June	74·78	76·82	73·41	—
July – September	84·19	85·61	69·20	—
October – December	90·53	87·50	76·38	—
Yearly Average	82·29	84·63	74·92	—

The averages for April and May 1965 have been 63·58 and 68·39 respectively.

A marked deterioration in the length of credit taken is evident throughout 1964 and in 1965 so far. With the continuance of the 'credit squeeze' this tendency seems likely to continue.

A significant point, not evident from the above, is that, with some exceptions, large debtor units as well as small, appear equally at fault.

The 'bad debt record' has not, so far, shown any change.

The situation, if general, would appear to indicate a fruitful field for invoice factoring.

Yours faithfully,

J. W. SIMPSON, C.A.

The Directors' Warning

SIR, – You do your publication less than justice on June 12th, in your comments on Mr G. F. K. Morgan's letter, by beating so rapid a retreat through the undergrowth of innuendo. Your statement of May 29th that 'Many will feel that the Institute of Directors' pamphlet overdraws somewhat the present threat but it is idle to pretend that it is non-existent' was obviously critical of the Institute of Directors' pamphlet, and was intended to appeal to those faceless 'many' who do not like plain conclusions written in plain English

Your attitude was then quite intelligible although it would have come with more grace if it had been stated as your own opinion. Why then, when you are taken up on the matter by Mr Morgan, do you attempt to scuttle off by saying that since you must avoid participating in basically political issues you brought the views of the Institute of Directors to the attention of readers for them to judge for themselves whether the support of the profession is warranted? This over-hasty retraction will scarcely inspire confidence in the maturity or the tenacity of your judgements.

Yours faithfully,

Sidcup, Kent. T. A. BYRNE, F.C.A.

Taxation Case

In re Kilpatrick's Policies Trust

In the High Court of Justice (Chancery Division)

(Before Mr Justice CROSS)

Estate duty – Interest purchased or provided – Insurance policies – For benefit of wife if she survived husband for more than one month – Otherwise for sons equally – Whether beneficial interest passed at date of death – Whether beneficial interest arose at expiry of month – Married Women's Property Act, 1882, section 11 – Finance Act, 1894, sections 2 (1) (d), 22 (1) (l), – Finance Act, 1934, section 28 – Trustee Act, 1925, section 31.

The deceased effected fourteen policies on his life; each was a 'with profits' policy and was effected under the provisions of section 11 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. Each policy was for the benefit of the deceased's wife 'if she shall survive the assured for more than one month'. If the wife did not survive her husband for that period, the policy was to be for the benefit of their two sons in equal shares. All the policies were subsisting at the date of the deceased's death, and an aggregate sum of £66,638 19*s* 2*d* thereby became payable.

The Revenue claimed estate duty on the policies or their proceeds under section 2 (1) (d) of the Finance Act, 1894, either on the basis that there was a passing at the date of the deceased's death, or that there was a passing at the expiry of the one month.

The trustees contended that the interest of the wife in the policies became vested in her at the date when the policies were effected, but was liable to be divested in the event of her dying before the expiry of the one month; and that no change took place on her husband's death. They contended, alternatively, that, if a beneficial interest arose at the time of the expiry of the one month the value of the interest was nil, so the wife did not own any interest in expectancy.

The Revenue contended that the beneficial interest of the wife was a future interest during her husband's lifetime; and that on her death it changed to an interest in possession, so that there was then an arising of a beneficial interest within section 2 (1) (d), immediately before the expiration of the one month. They contended, alternatively, that the wife immediately before the expiration of the one month, had an interest in expectancy (the defeasible interest) within section 28 of the Finance Act, 1934; and that the value of that interest had to be left out of account in calculating the amount of the estate duty payable under section 2 (1) (d).

Held: (i) the wife took a vested interest in the policies. liable to be divested if she died before the expiry of the one month; (ii) that she had that beneficial interest in possession both before and after her husband's death, and the interest was not changed in any way on that death; (iii) that therefore no claim under section 2 (1) (d) was sustainable, (iv) that section 28 of the Finance Act, 1934, did not apply to a defeasible interest in possession; (v) that it was unnecessary to give a decision on the basis that there was an arising of a beneficial interest at the expiry of the one month from the date of the death.

Scottish Institute's Summer School

THE thirteenth annual summer school of The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland, which assembled at the University of St Andrews on Friday of last week and dispersed on Tuesday, was attended by 112 members. Also present as guests of the Institute were Mr H. Hodgson, F.C.A., F.C.W.A., and Mr M. H. Walters, C.B.E., President and Secretary, respectively, of The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants, and Mr I. G. S. Groundwater.

On arrival members attended an address, illustrated by slides, entitled 'Mediaeval Scotland and St Andrews' given by Professor L. H. Butler, M.A., D.PHIL., F.R.HIST.S., Professor of Medieval History, St Salvator's College. Later, at dinner, members were welcomed by Professor A. E. Ritchie, M.A., B.SC., M.D., F.R.S.E., Dean of the Faculty of Science and Chandos Professor of Physiology in the University of St Andrews, and by Mr Robert Browning, C.B.E., M.A., LL.B., C.A., President of the Scottish Institute.

After dinner the first address, entitled 'British management and leadership' was given by Mr D. L. Nicolson, B.SC., A.C.G.I., M.I.MECH.E., M.I.P.E., M.I.R.N.A., Chairman of P-E Consulting Group Ltd. In the course of his address Mr Nicolson expressed the view that management could benefit from greater liaison with the universities, politicians and sociologists and from paying greater attention to military organization. The main themes of Mr Nicolson's address were the attitudes of management to people, to growth, to planning and to information. The address was followed by an interesting question and answer session.

On Saturday morning, Mr C. I. R. Hutton, B.A., C.A., a partner in McClelland, Moores & Co, London, presented a paper on, 'Sources of business credit and financial reporting to obtain it'. In his paper Mr Hutton surveyed the field of business credit available to the smaller business and provided a substantial bibliography of books and pamphlets on the subject. A car treasure hunt was organized in the afternoon by Mr Q. T. Crichton. The winning car was driven by Mr C. P. Lynch, with Mr M. G. M. Petrie and Mr N. A. Watt as navigators.

On Sunday morning members attended divine worship in the Collegiate Church of St Salvator. The service was conducted by the Reverend Ernest G. Sangster, B.D., Chaplin to the St Andrews Colleges; the lessons were ready by the President, and by the Vice-President, Mr E. Birnie Reid, O.B.E., T.D., D.L., C.A.

Investors and Company Accounts

Later on Sunday, Mr A. F. Murray, M.A., F.I.A., Joint Secretary and Investment Manager, the Prudential Assurance Company, presented a paper the subject of which was 'What investors want from company accounts'. In the course of his paper Mr Murray showed how the requirements of investors as regards both the contents of company accounts and the manner of their presentation depended upon the type of security held, the size of the holding, and the financial expertise of the investor or of his professional advisers, such as investment analysts. He argued the general case for statutory regulation to ensure the satisfaction of investor's requirements in the direction of fuller disclosure, by showing that these requirements coincided with the national economic interest. There followed a brief description of the present legal position and its historical background, leading up to specific suggestions for improvements in company accounts. The practical implications of some of these suggestions were brought out in three short case studies. Mr Murray's paper will be reproduced in full in later issues of The Accountant.

On Sunday afternoon a golf competition against bogey was played over Balcomie Links, Crail, a village some ten miles from St Andrews on the Fife Ness. The leading scores returned were:

A. W. F. Wright
J. F. de W. Duvoisin
S. L. Henderson
C. I. R. Hutton
} all square.

Mr Wright by virtue of the best inward half won the 'Summer School Trophy'.

On Monday, Mr Ronald Peddie, B.A., C.A., J.P., Secretary, The United Steel Companies Ltd, presented a paper entitled 'The assessment of profitability', in which he discussed the factors affecting the assessment of profitability and of the techniques now being used in its determination for a business as a whole, for a particular process or item of plant, and for a specific product.

The proceedings of the school terminated last Monday evening with the official dinner, at which the toast of the University of St Andrews was proposed by the Vice-President. The reply on behalf of the University was made by Professor A. A. Matheson, Q.C., M.A., LL.B., Master of Queen's College and Professor of Scots Law, who also proposed the toast of the Institute. Mr Browning, the President of the Institute, replied.

The summer school is an important event in the Scottish Institute's calendar, constituting as it does a valuable link between the Council and members, as well as giving members the opportunity of meeting each other to discuss their problems. St Andrews is an ideal setting for the summer school, but success could not have been achieved without the tireless efforts of the Convener, Mr J. A. Stewart, who has retired after three successful years of office. His successor is Mr T. N. Ritchie.

Estate Duty: Owner-occupied Houses

Mrs THATCHER asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the cost, for estate duty purposes, of raising the exemption limit from £5,000 to £6,000, of providing that an owner-occupied house shall rank as a separate estate, and of providing that an owner-occupied house should be valued on an existing-use basis, respectively.

Mr MACDERMOT: To increase the exemption limit for estate duty by £1,000 to £6,000 would cost about £½ million in a full year assuming that there would be no relief for estates over £6,000. To treat owner-occupied houses as separate estates for estate duty purposes would cost nearly £20 million in a full year. It is not possible to give an estimate of the cost of valuing owner-occupied houses for estate duty purposes on an existing-use basis.

£ Sterling

Mr BENCE asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer by how much the internal purchasing power of the £ sterling has fallen over the last twenty-five years; and by how much ordinary shares have appreciated during the same period.

Mr MACDERMOT: The internal purchasing power of the £ sterling in 1964 was about 32 per cent of its value in 1938. There is no official index of the price of ordinary shares and the indexes compiled by outside bodies give different figures. They suggest, however, that ordinary share prices in 1964 were about four to four and a half times their price in 1938.

Taxation and National Insurance Contributions: Increased Yield

Sir C. OSBORNE asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the extent to which his new taxation, together with the £300 million insurance contributions, will be sufficient to finance the additional Government expenditure of 8·9 per cent above last year; if he will give an assurance that he will reduce Government expenditure before imposing further taxation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr DIAMOND: The increased yields from taxation and National Insurance contributions will be more than enough to cover the increase in supply expenditure and the increase in National Insurance benefits.

Not any more Madam!

The all-new KIM dishwasher has been developed by the precision-minded Swiss to fit real-life kitchens. It loads from the front in exactly one minute. It gets dishes, glasses, cups, knives, forks and spoons, whistling, shiny, clean . . . spotlessly dry. And it costs just 75 gns.

They have finally perfected dishwashers. The new KIM dishwasher, after heating the water, will wash and dry the dishes, cups and cutlery used by six people in eight and a half minutes! And–hold your breath–it will do them as thoroughly and as efficiently as you could do them yourself, even more hygienically.

Designed for real-life kitchens. The new KIM is truly a table-model dishwasher. The base measures exactly 19½ inches by 19½ inches. It does not have to be plumbed in. (No installation charges.) It sits with beautiful compactness on top of your draining board or working surface or, if you prefer, on its own 'working space' trolley.

Perfect for directors' dining rooms. KIM's low-cost efficiency makes special good sense for directors' dining rooms. More important than ever since the Budget!

KIM is completely automatic. Here is what you do: Load the dishes, cups, glasses and cutlery into their own specially cushioned slots. Slide the single rack back into the machine. Close the door. Turn on the tap for a minute. Press the button.

Here is what KIM does: Heats the water to 150°F. Mixes in a special detergent. Washes each piece perfectly with a powerful curtain of water. (Only the water moves.) Rinses everything with fresh, hot, clean water. Dries contents to a bright shine. Empties the water into your sink. Shuts itself off.

KIM is simplicity itself. The ingenious Swiss have eliminated all the unnecessary bulk and trim and developed a precision-minded marvel that is simplicity itself. That's why KIM, the new fully-automatic dishwasher, costs just 75 gns. (Easy credit terms available.)

About the makers of KIM. It took five long years of design, research and testing to develop a dishwasher as practical as KIM. The people responsible are Switzerland's largest manufacturers of fully automatic washing machines and dishwashers. KIM dishwashers are now being manufactured in Britain and are being serviced within hours of your call by a large force of fully-trained British engineers. KIM is completely guaranteed for one year–both parts and labour!

THE INSTITUTE OF INTERNAL AUDITORS

LONDON CHAPTER

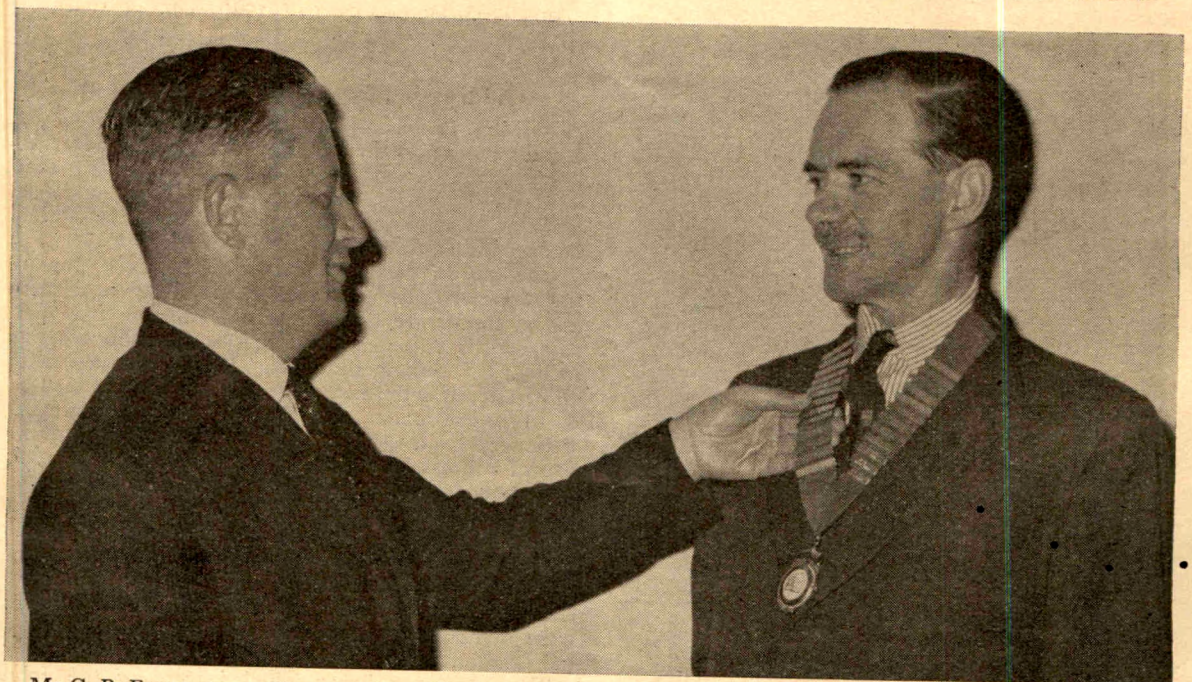
Seventeenth Annual General Meeting

The seventeenth annual general meeting of the London Chapter of The Institute of Internal Auditors, was held at the Kingsley Hotel on June 16th.

The Chapter President, Mr J. H. Protheroe, A.A.C.C.A., A.I.M.T.A., in the chair, welcomed the guests who included Professor Lemke from Michigan State University, Mr Yoichi Kusakabe from Waseda University, Tokyo, Mr A. R. Barki, a member from Israel, and Mr Menon, a member from Brunei. All the guests were visiting the United Kingdom to obtain further information on modern internal audit techniques.

Mr Protheroe reported that much useful progress had been made by the Chapter during the past year. In addition to the usual monthly luncheon and dinner meetings, which have been well attended, successful day courses had been arranged for members and their assistants. It was now intended to extend these activities with seminars and forums on subjects of special interest to internal auditors.

Increased Membership



Membership of the London Chapter had continued to increase, despite the fact that it was restricted mainly to internal auditors holding managerial or supervisory positions. A broadening of the basis of membership had been under consideration by the governors during the past year but there were many difficulties to resolve. The governors were unanimous that the high standard of membership must be maintained, but they felt something should be done to provide a form of membership for internal audit staff unable to qualify for full membership.

Members of the Chapter have contributed articles on internal audit topics to the accountancy Press during the year. Speakers have also been provided for many other meetings in the United Kingdom. It is expected that requests will continue as the value of internal audit to top management becomes more widely appreciated, and a panel of speakers has now been established.

The suitability of the title of the Institute was questioned by some members as it was felt that it did not give a satisfactory indication of the work carried out by members. It was generally felt, however, that the name should remain unchanged but that every effort be made to improve the 'public image' of internal audit by way of further talks, articles, etc.

New President

Mr C. P. Evans, F.C.A., Finance Officer (Audit), B.R.S. Federation Ltd, was elected President of the Chapter for the ensuing twelve months. Mr Sidney S. Ross, Chief Internal Auditor, Joseph Lucas (Industries) Ltd. was elected First Vice-President, and Mr G. T. Sentance, Manager, Group Internal Audit, Shell-Mex and B.P. Ltd, Second Vice-President.

Low-priced Add-lister

N.C.R.'s range of add-listing machines is now augmented by a compact twelve-key machine called the Class 15. Separate models are available for hand and electric operation. The hand-operated model measures 12×7×3½ in., and weighs 7½ lb.

Attractively styled, with a one-piece, easy-to-clean case, the machine has features not usually found in its size and price range. Credit balances are automatically calculated and printed. A repeat lever enables any amount entered on the keyboard to be added to the total as many times as required. Other controls include a subtract key; sub-totalling facilities; a column indicator and error-correction lever; and a non-add key for the entry of dates and reference numbers.

The sterling recording and totalling capacity of both models is one penny short of £1 million. By flicking a lever, the Class 15 can be converted to work in whole-numbers.

Price: Hand operated £39 10*s*; electrically operated £63.

For Layouts or Charting

REXEL's new Graf-tape charting tapes make any kind of graphic presentation simple. Straight lines, blocks or curves are drawn in tape with the pen-style dispenser. The tape is tough, even in its narrowest width of 1/64 in. Besides straight or curved lines, rules and borders can be 'drawn with tape' for both layout or finished reproduction with great accuracy, neatness and speed. Apart from its obvious applications in layout and reproduction work, Graf-tape is suitable for any kind of graphic presentation. Diagrams, graphs, production, planning control and organization charts, progress chasing, are a few typical applications.

Graf-tape is supplied in a wide variety of colours, widths and patterns, and for professional layout and reproduction work a variety of border designs and symbols is also available. These are printed in black matt on a non-reflective surface.

Rexel Ltd, Rexel House, Duke's Road, London WC1.

New Transfer Copier

THE latest model in the range of photocopiers from Ellams Duplicator Co Ltd is known as the A3B; the maximum copying area of this transfer-diffusion copier is 20 in. by 14 in. while the width of the feed to the developer section is 14 in.

The contact pressure lid can be quickly detached so that copies can be made of pages in thick books. Also copies can be made from large documents without the need to fold the original.

Price: £98.

Ellams Duplicator Co Ltd, Walton Road, Watford, Herts.

Addressing from Computer Print-out

COMPUTERS which have brought so much automation to the keeping of accounts, nevertheless do not assist when a firm wishes to mail to its regular customers (or its shareholders) a special item such as details of new products (or annual reports and accounts).

One way of dealing with the matter is to prepare transfer-carbon lists on computer print-out equipment and subsequently use the list to address envelopes. Another way is to maintain a space-consuming separate mailing list (either on address plates or stencils) with all its attendant problems of updating. A third method is to use a machine which will take continuous stationery from computers or tabulators, cut to the size of address labels, apply gum and affix the labels to envelopes or wrappers. An American machine to do this work is available.

Now a British-designed and made machine (from Stow & Partners Ltd) has made its debut on a service basis in South London in the premises of Mears, Caldwell, Hacker Ltd. Here the machine's capabilities were demonstrated recently to visiting members of the London Registrars Group.

The envelopes being labelled were of the John Dickinson Seal-Easi Autotuk kind; with their self-sealing adhesive flaps they would be tricky to use on most machines, yet the Stow equipment dealt with them quite competently.

The size of envelope or wrapper that can be dealt with by this new machine is from 3½ in. by 6 in. to 15 in. by 15 in. and a maximum output of 9,000 addressed envelopes an hour is claimed.

For Spirit Duplicating

THE new Roneo 7 series of spirit duplicators operates at up to eighty copies a minute. The range includes hand and electric models and machines for printing up to 17×14 in. or two stacks of smaller paper side by side.

The Roneo Model 750 stencil duplicator is now available in a new model, the Mark III. It has a new feed mechanism that incorporates lift-off rollers and paper separators designed to cut down wasteful double-feeding. It copes well with ream ends, creates less paper fluff and thereby prolongs stencil life. A complete change of colour can be made in twenty-five seconds by lifting out one cylinder and replacing it with another, without dirtying the hands.

Roneo Ltd, 17 Southampton Row, London WC1.

Ten-way Intercom for £105

D.J.P. Telephones Ltd, have introduced a ten-way intercom which costs £105 complete with all wiring. The system comprises ten push-button intercoms, one hundred yards multicore cable and a supply unit. Distance of operation is good and the manufacturers claim good performance over one thousand yards. The system is flexible and initially a few telephones can be installed and added to as required.

D.J.P. Telephones Ltd, 156 Camden High Street, London NW1.

Stencil Filing Cabinet

A SUSPENDED filing principle is used in the new stencil filing cabinet from Ellams Duplicator Co Ltd. The stencils are clipped to a backing card which has a metal strip at the top; the ends of the strip protrude to form hooks that slide along the pull-out rails of the cabinet. The cabinet measures 20 by 21 by 30 in.

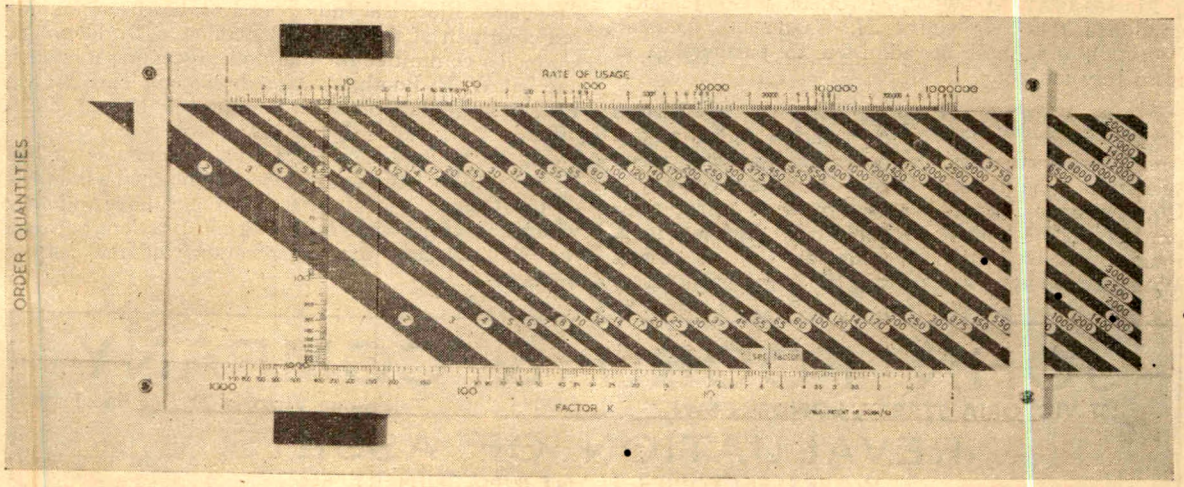
Price: £18 12*s* 3*d*.

Ellams Duplicator Co Ltd, Walton Road, Watford, Herts.

For Stock Ordering

AN inexpensive aid, known as the Stoculator, which enables stock control personnel easily to calculate stock order quantities for a large variety of items is now available.

In recent years a number of equations have been evolved to allow these calculations to be made, but their complex nature has put them beyond the capabilities of most stock control personnel. The Stoculator, similar to a slide-rule in design and operation, enables order quantities to be read off for any rate of usage and unit cost, after a control factor (the K factor) has been set on it. The upper scale (see illustration) shows rates of usage, and the lower scale the previously calculated K factor. The quantities to be ordered are read off the diagonal bands.



The use of the quantities indicated by the Stoculator ensures that stock orders are in the correct relative proportions and that a company's stores will be at an economical minimum.

Stocks can also be varied from the theoretical minimum overall stock-holding and operating costs in order to meet local conditions, e.g., shortage of financial resources, overload on stock and progress control personnel, or shortage of production capacity due to a large proportion of setting-up time required to obtain minimum overall costs.

Reductions in stock holdings of 10–30 per cent are claimed to result from the use of the Stoculator.

Price: £12 12*s*.

There has been a significant increase in the number of students following the institution of the degree of B.Sc.(Econ.). Forty-six students are now taking approved degree courses at Cardiff.

The fifty-first year of the South Wales Student Society has, the report states, been a most active one. Following the encouraging support of the Society's first week-end residential course, it is hoped to hold another course in the autumn in conjunction with the South Wales and Bristol Societies. Lectures continue to be well supported and a travel subsidy scheme to encourage students from outlying areas to attend lectures has been commenced. The West Wales Student Society organized several lectures during the year and two film shows were presented describing the workings of selected industrial and commercial organizations.

RATES IN 1965–66

Of the 820 local authorities outside the Greater London Council area included in the Institute of Municipal Treasurers and Accountants Return of Rates 1965–66[1] published last week, 770 show an increase in rate poundage, 2 a decrease and 48 no change.

The return shows that local authority expenditure has risen by more than the rise in rate poundage and if the majority of authorities had not used balances in hand to offset the increase in expenditure, rates would have risen more sharply. Of the 853 authorities included in the survey 685 reduced their balances, 92 added to them and 76 left them unchanged. Rate poundages have risen by 8.1 per cent, but expenditure has risen by 10·3 per cent.

The average amount of rates paid by the individual householder in the various local authorities is also given in the return, These range from £13 4*s* in Todmorden, Yorkshire, to £112 4*s* in the London Borough of Kensington and Chelsea. The amount paid by householders is less than £40 a year in 75 per cent of the authorities included in the survey. In the case of 93 authorities, the average rates paid by the domestic ratepayers is more than £50. Of these, 22 are in the area of the Greater London Council, and the remainder, with very few exceptions, are either in the south-east or are seaside resorts.

An Introduction to Cost Accountancy

by R. WARWICK DOBSON,
C.A., F.C.W.A.
Silver Medallist of the Institute of Cost and Works Accountants

Vol. I – COSTING AND COST CONTROL (Revised First Edition)

This volume is devoted entirely to cost ascertainment and cost control. It deals with the historical, standard and marginal costing techniques and with uniform costing, budgetary control, and cost improvement. It describes in addition to the methods of evaluating the factors of production, the methods of analysing and classifying costs for control purposes. It concentrates on the essentials by leaving to other volumes the forms and appliances used in recording cost data.

'. . . The books can be thoroughly recommended, not only to the student of cost accountancy but also to the accountant in industry. . . .' – Times Review of Industry.

Price 37s 6d net.

Vol. II – THE ELEMENTS OF COST ACCOUNTING (Second Edition)

Attention is directed in this volume to the fundamentals of the mechanics of cost accounting – the organization of cost accounting departments, the machines and appliances which may be used (with many illustrations), the design of the forms on which records are made, and the construction of procedure records and manuals of instruction. Two chapters are devoted to cost book-keeping and an example of integral accounts. The fundamentals of preparation and the presentation of cost information to management and the audit of costs are the subjects of the remaining chapters.

'. . . The three volumes taken together give the reader a detailed exposition of a very important subject, and the author is justified in claiming that his work is fuller than any previously published in this country. . . .' – The Engineer.

Price 37s 6d net.

Vol. III – COST RECORDING AND PRESENTATION (Reprinted First Edition)

The many methods by which the process of cost accounting is in practice carried out are profusely illustrated and described. Short-cut methods and up-to-date practices are presented to the reader. Each chapter is devoted to one aspect such as materials accounting, wages accounting, cost centre accounting, standard cost accounting, etc. At the same time, each chapter deals with the basic records required, the book-keeping entries involved, and form of presentation of information concerning the particular aspect dealt with in the chapter. By dealing with the details of the cost accounting mechanism in a separate volume, more illustrations have been provided than could otherwise have been possible.

'. . . Now that the work can be read in its entirety, it may be said without qualification that the author has fairly and squarely succeeded in his objective and that he has produced a textbook of real and lasting value to future generations of costing students.– The Accountant.
